In accordance with general principles, the declaration, petition, or complaint in an action for injuries resulting from fire set out by a railroad must show the existence of a legal duty on the part of the railroad company to exercise care as to the property injured,[96] and, in the absence of a statute abrogating the common-law rule making negligence an element of liability of railroad companies for injuries resulting from fire set out by them, the declaration, petition, or complaint must allege that the injury was the result of the negligence or breach of duty of the company.[97] However, it has also been held, under statutes making injuries by fire set out by a railroad company prima facie proof of negligence, that it will be sufficient to allege facts making out a prima facie case without expressly alleging negligence[98] on the theory that in these circumstances negligence will be presumed until the contrary is shown.[99]

Under statutes which impose an absolute liability on railroad companies for all damages by fire set out by them, discussed supra § 485, it is unnecessary in actions to recover for injuries so sustained to allege that defendant was guilty of negligence,[1] although it is still necessary to allege that the fire was caused by the company.[2] An allegation of negligence will be treated as surplusage and disregarded,[3] and a recovery may be had on a complaint otherwise sufficient although no negligence is shown.[4]

The declaration, petition, or complaint must show that the locomotive was owned or operated by de-

Complaint for damages resulting from burning of plaintiff's warehouse and blacksmith shop by fire started by hobos in railroad's freight cars standing on siding, which failed to allege facts showing that defendant's act of leaving empty cars on siding over night near plaintiff's warehouse violated plaintiff's rights, or that it was customary usage of railroads to lock doors of empty freight cars or place them in charge of watchman when not in use on siding, was held demurrable.—Aune v. fendant,[5] and it must also show that the act or negligence of defendant was the proximate cause of the injury complained of,[6] whether the injury was to plaintiff's property[7] or to his person.[8] A person will not be entitled to recover where he alleges a new, independent, intervening cause which was not produced by the acts or omissions on which the action is predicated.[9] Although there is authority to the contrary,[10] according to some decisions it is not sufficient to allege the negligence as that of the company's agents or employees unless it is also alleged that they were engaged in the line of their employment.[11] It is sufficient to charge the act causing the injury as that of the railroad company;[12] and this is so although the action is based on a statute making the company liable for damages to property by fire communicated by its locomotives or originating on its right of way "in consequence of the act of any of its authorized agents or employees."[13]

While there is some authority to the contrary,[14] in accordance with general principles the particular act or omission constituting the negligence relied on as a ground for recovery must be stated,[15] and any generalization in respect of negligence which is not coupled with an averment concerning some act or omission will be disregarded.[16] However, no further particularity than that herein mentioned in stating the negligence relied on is necessary;[17] and it is not essential that all the facts and circumstances from which negligence could be inferred should be alleged[18] or that the particular employee to whose negligence the injury was traceable should be specified.[19] It has been said that, where the facts alleged disclose a duty on the part of defendant, the allegation of negligence takes on a technical significance, and that a very general averment relative to what was negligently done or omitted ordinarily will be a sufficient averment of negligence as against a demurrer.[20] A complaint alleging negligence in the alternative has been held not demurrable.[21]

(2) Defects in, or Mismanagement of, Locomotives

Where defects in the construction or equipment of locomotives or negligence in the management thereof constitute the negligence relied on as a ground for recovery, it is necessary to allege that the railroad company has been negligent in the construction, equipment, or management of its locomotives whereby the fire escaped and the injury was caused.

Where the conduct constituting negligence must be alleged, if defects in the construction or equipment of locomotives or negligence in the management thereof are the negligence relied on as a ground for recovery, it is necessary to allege that the railroad company has been negligent in the construction, equipment, or management of its locomotives whereby the fire escaped and the injury was caused.[22] However, a statement of these grounds in general terms ordinarily is sufficient.[23] It is not necessary to specify the particular defects in the locomotive or the mismanagement thereof,[24] because its condition and management are matters peculiarly within the knowledge of defendant.[25]

(3) Combustible Matter on Right of Way

The plaintiff must allege the negligent accumulation of combustible matter on the railroad's right of way or there can be no recovery on that ground for damage done by fire.

Plaintiff must allege the negligent accumulation of combustible matter on the railroad's right of way or there can be no recovery on that ground for damage done by fire.[26] It has been held that a complaint alleging that defendant managed its trains negligently and failed to employ suitable means to prevent the escape of fire from the locomotive, and also negligently permitted combustible materials to remain on the right of way, and that by reason of its negligence fire escaped from the locomotive and set fire to the combustibles, and by reason of a continuous body of combustible material the fire was communicated to plaintiff's premises, sufficiently alleges the negligent accumulation of combustible materials on the right of way as a cause of the fire.[27] On the other hand, it has been held that an allegation that defendant carelessly permitted fire from the engine of a train to be thrown out, whereby the litter which said company had permitted to accumulate on said right of way was ignited, and the fire spread therefrom and burned and destroyed plaintiff's property, did not amount to an averment that the railroad company negligently permitted combustible matter to accumulate upon its right of way.[28]

(4) Spread of Fire

Where the gist of the action is negligence in permitting the escape of fire to the plaintiff's land from the railroad's right of way, the complaint must allege that the railroad negligently permitted the escape of the fire, although it need not allege that the fire was negligently started.

A complaint which alleges negligence of a railroad both in setting fires to combustibles on its right of way and in failing to prevent the spread of the fire so started to adjoining land resulting in injury thereto is sufficient to show a cause of action.[29] Where the gist of the action is negligence in permitting the escape of fire to plaintiff's land from defendant's right of way, the complaint need not show that the fire was negligently started,[30] but it is indispensable that the complaint should allege that defendant negligently permitted the escape of fire to plaintiff's land from defendant's right of way.[31] In jurisdictions where it is held that a company negligently setting out a fire on its right of way which spreads to adjoining lands, injuring them, is not liable unless it was negligent in suffering the fire so to spread, the complaint must allege that the company was negligent in permitting the fire so started to escape therefrom to the adjoining premises[32] or contain averments from which such negligence is necessarily implied;[33] and a mere averment that the fire was negligently started on the right of way will not dispense with, or supply the place of, such allegation.[34]

From adjoining owner's premises. Where the complaint alleges that fire was negligently set out on its right of way and on the land of an adjoining owner by defendant, and that the fire spread to plaintiff's lands whereby his property was destroyed, and that the fire was wholly the result of the negligence of defendant, it is not necessary further to aver the negligence of defendant in preventing the fire escaping from its right of way.[35] A complaint alleging that defendant negligently permitted fire on its right of way to escape to adjoining land, igniting it, and thence to plaintiff's land, is sufficient, without alleging negligence in permitting the fire to escape from the adjoining land to that of plaintiff.[36] A complaint alleging that defendant negligently and willfully set fire to combustibles upon the land of an adjoining owner, that the fire spread to and upon plaintiff's land, which act was the natural and probable result of defendant's wrongful act, has been held to state a good cause of action.[37]

risdictions where contributory negligence is considered a matter of defense to be pleaded by defendant, it is not necessary that the complaint should negative the fact of plaintiff's contributory negligence.[39] In jurisdictions where contributory negligence must be negatived in the complaint, except in cases where the rule has been abrogated by statute,[40] it has generally been held necessary for the complaint in actions of this character to negative contributory negligence.[41]

d. Amendments

The allowance of amendments of the declaration, petition, or complaint in an action against a railroad company for damages caused by fire is within the discretion of the court, although generally amendments which set up a new and distinct cause of action will not be permitted.

The allowance of amendments of the declaration, petition, or complaint in an action against a railroad company for damages caused by fire is within the discretion of the court.[42] Generally amendments which set up a new and distinct cause of action will not be permitted.[43] It is permissible to amend by adding a more specific description of the property burned,[44] or an amplification of the facts constituting defendant's negligence,[45] or by changing the date on which the injury is alleged to have occurred,[46] or the identity of the locomotive alleged to have caused the injury,[47] or by correctly stating the name of the defendant railroad.[48]

§ 514. Plea or Answer

The plea or answer in an action against a railroad company for injuries by fire set out by it should allege matters which constitute an affirmative defense.

The plea or answer in an action against a railroad company for injuries by fire set out by it need not allege mere matters of evidence.[49] Ordinarily, under the general rule, contributory negligence must be specially pleaded in order to be available as a defense,[50] and it has been held that, if defendant wishes to avail himself of the defense that plaintiff was a trespasser in placing the property destroyed on defendant's right of way, it is necessary to plead that fact since it is an affirmative defense.[51] The defense that defendant was exempt by contract from liability for fire is an affirmative one not admissible under the general denial.[52] If defendant admits that the fire was caused by sparks from its locomotive and pleads facts indicating lack of negligence, its plea is in effect a plea of confession and avoidance.[53] The sufficiency of a plea should be tested by demurrer[54] except where another mode is provided by statute.[55]

§ 515. Issues, Proof, and Variance

b. Conformity of pleadings and proof
c. Variance

a. In General

While allegations of facts immaterial to the cause of action or which constitute mere surplusage need not be proved, the specific negligence alleged must be proved in order to authorize a recovery for damages by fire caused by a railroad.

While allegations of facts immaterial to the cause of action or which constitute mere surplusage need not be proved,[56] the specific negligence alleged must be proved in order to authorize a recovery for damage by fire caused by a railroad.[57] If several acts of negligence are charged, each of which would constitute a cause of action, proof of any one of them will sustain a recovery.[58] If the complaint alleges the burning of several articles, plaintiff will be entitled to recover on showing that any of the articles mentioned were burned.[59] Where plaintiff alleges ownership of the property destroyed by the fire, he must prove title to the property.[60] Where negligence is charged in permitting combustibles to accumulate on the right of way which were ignited by sparks from a locomotive, thus causing the fire occasioning the damages, it will be sufficient for plaintiff to show that defendant was using the ground as a part of its right of way, and he need not prove title or ownership of the locus in quo in defendant, since, the use being shown, the law will presume that the right to use had been properly acquired.[61]

b. Conformity of Pleadings and Proof

The evidence in actions for injuries by fire set out by a railroad must correspond with, and be confined to, the issues raised by the pleading.

In accordance with elementary principles, the evidence in actions for injuries by fire set out by a railroad company must correspond with, and be confined to, the issues raised by the pleading[62] or tend to elucidate the issues.[63] Evidence of one kind of negligence not alleged is not admissible under an allegation of negligence of a different kind.[64]

Allegations that the locomotive was improperly constructed and negligently managed by defendant, by reason whereof large quantities of sparks were emitted, are sufficiently broad to admit proof of the character of care and caution exercised by defendant's employees in operating the locomotive, and as to whether they were negligent in the performance of their duties.[65] Where the negligence alleged is in the operation of the locomotive, evidence is admissible to show that fire escaped through the spark arrester and was communicated from the smokestack of the locomotive.[66]

Evidence of defective construction or equipment of a locomotive is admissible under an averment that in operating it defendant negligently permitted it to emit sparks which fell on plaintiff's property and set fire thereto,[67] or under an averment that defendant so negligently and carelessly managed a fire which it intentionally kindled and maintained in a certain locomotive that the fire came into and upon plaintiff's premises.[68] The charge that the train was so negligently operated as to set fire to plaintiff's barn has been held sufficient to permit plaintiff to show that the fire was caused by sparks from an engine with a defective spark arrester.[69] It has been held that, if defendant tries the case on the assumption that the existence of defects in the locomotive is an issuable fact, he cannot object to the admission of evidence to show such defects although the petition did not allege their existence.[70] However, it has been declared that where the complaint charges only negligence in the operation of an engine, and not in its construction or equipment, evidence of the character and quality of the construction or equipment of the engine, with a view to arresting the escape of sparks therefrom, is inadmissible.[71]

Evidence as to the condition of the grates of the locomotive on the day of the fire is admissible under an averment that the locomotive was defective and dangerous.[72] In some jurisdictions where, contrary to the prevailing doctrine, the view has been taken that it is not necessary to specify the particular negligent acts or omissions relied on, negligence in the construction, equipment, or operation of locomotives is admissible under a general averment of negligence in causing the injury complained of by fire.[73]

c. Variance

A material variance between the pleading and the evidence is fatal to a recovery for injuries by fire set out by a railroad.

In accordance with the rule that the proofs must correspond substantially with the allegations of the pleadings, a material variance between the declaration, petition, or complaint, and the evidence to sustain it, is fatal to a recovery for injuries by fire

§ 516. Presumptions and Burden of Proof

a. In general
b. Negligence in construction, equipment, or operation of locomotive

a. In General

In the absence of a statute providing otherwise, negligence of a railroad company is never presumed in an action to recover for injuries by fire set out by a railroad, and the burden of proof is on the plaintiff to show that the railroad company was negligent.

In the absence of a statute providing otherwise, negligence of a railroad company, being the gist of an action to recover for injuries to property by fire set out by a railroad is never presumed.[76] Except where statutes have eliminated negligence as an element of liability for injuries to property by fires set out by railroad companies,[77] the burden of proof is on plaintiff to show that defendant was negligent[78] and that such negligence was the proximate cause of the injury.[79] Where plaintiff's evidence makes out a prima facie case of negligence on defendant's part, the burden is then cast on defendant to show that it has not been guilty of negligence.[80] However, a fire along a railroad right of way does not result in a prima facie case of negligence until it is established that the railroad set out the fire.[81]

It has generally been held that, in the absence of any statutory provision to the contrary, in an action for injuries to property by fire set out to clear the right of way, the burden of proof is on plaintiff to show that defendant was negligent in setting out the fire or in preventing its escape,[82] although there is some authority to the contrary.[83] It has also been held that a fire set out to clear a right of way of combustible material is not set out or caused by operating the railway within a statute providing that in an action for damages from a fire so set out it shall only be necessary to prove injury to, or destruction of, plaintiff's property;[84] but there is also authority directly to the contrary.[85]

Fire originating in combustible matter on right of way. If it is sought to charge a company with liability for a fire communicated from combustibles on its right of way, the burden is on plaintiff to show that there was an accumulation of combustible matter on the right of way[86] and that the fire was set out on the right of way by defendant;[87] and, in the absence of a statute providing otherwise, the burden is also on plaintiff to show that

"Adjacent" land half mile away
In action for damages to land of plaintiff caused by fire allegedly ignited by railroad locomotive, complaint alleging that plaintiff's land was "adjacent" to defendant's right of way was supported by proof that the land was about a half mile distant from the right of way, and that the land was in an area of large tracts of woodland and interspersing cultivated tracts.—Alabama Great Southern R. defendant was negligent in leaving combustible matter on the right of way;[88] and it has been held that this rule is not changed by a statute providing that companies shall be responsible for destruction of property by fire communicated directly or indirectly by locomotives.[89] However, the statutes of some jurisdictions have been construed as imposing on a railroad company the burden of showing that a fire originating in combustibles on its right of way was not due to its negligence in leaving the right of way in an unsafe condition.[90]

Fire communicated from burning building or car on right of way. In the absence of a statute providing otherwise, it has been held that the mere fact that fire was communicated to plaintiff's property from a burning car or building on defendant's right of way does not make out a prima facie case of negligence.[91] The same rules of evidence as to the burden of proof, it has been said, seem to prevail as in other cases of fire communicated from one building to another or from one premises to another.[92] However, under a statute, a presumption of negligence arises where it is shown that damage to the property of another was caused by fire spreading from a burning car belonging to a railroad company and located on a sidetrack.[93]

Contractual exemption. Plaintiff has the burden of proving the illegality of a contract exempting a railroad from liability for damages where the contract is not void on its face.[94] The fact that defendant leased plaintiff the right to construct certain buildings on station grounds, subject to freedom from liability for loss by fire, does not raise an inference that other buildings of plaintiff destroyed by fire and partially standing on defendant's ground were subject to the same exemption.[95] Where defendant seeks to avoid responsibility under a contract exempting it from any and all liability for property destroyed by fire communicated from locomotives operating on a spur track on its property adjoining plaintiff's mill, and it is shown that the fire by which plaintiff's property was destroyed was caused by sparks emitted from one of defendant's locomotives then on the main line, the burden of proof is on defendant to show that the locomotive was then engaged in work connected with the use of the spur track.[96]

b. Negligence in Construction, Equipment, or Operation of Locomotive

(1) In general
(2) After proof that locomotive started fire

(1) In General

In an action seeking damages for fire caused by a railroad engine, the plaintiff must prove that the engine was either improperly equipped or negligently operated.

Plaintiff seeking damages for fire caused by sparks from a railroad engine is required to prove that the engine was improperly equipped for arresting sparks or that, although the engine was properly equipped, it was negligently operated so as to cause the fire,[97] because a railroad which has complied with the law with respect to equipment cannot be held liable for such a fire unless there is proof of negligent operation.[98] However, if the railroad company admits that the fire was caused by sparks from its locomotive and pleads facts indicating lack of negligence, it assumes the burden of proof.[99] Where it is shown that the appliances used by a railroad have been in use for many years and found sufficient to protect its own and other property, the burden of proof is on plaintiff to show that the appliances were defective or were improperly or negligently used.[1] Where a fire is set out by sparks from a locomotive which is admittedly in perfect condition, plaintiff has the burden of proving that the engine was less safe in the matter of sparks than a newer pattern of engine known and in use at the time.[2] Where, in an action for injuries from fire set out by a locomotive, a duty on the part of the company to use fuel oil in its locomotives is alleged, the burden of showing that it was negligent in using coal instead of oil is on plaintiff[3] The burden does not rest on the company to prove that it was using the best fuel commonly used by the best-equipped railway companies.[4]

A presumption of ordinary care will be indulged in favor of the railroad company where there is an entire absence of evidence that the fire causing the damage was caused by sparks from its locomotive.[5] Negligence in the equipment, repair, or operation of an engine may be inferred from the fact that the engine habitually scatters sparks to such an extent as to endanger combustible material all along the line of the road,[6] or that it emits a stream of sparks along its way, setting fire to many things,[7] or that it emits sparks unusual in quantity or character,[8] but it cannot be inferred from the fact that some time after the fire the appliances for arresting sparks were out of repair;[9] nor is there a presumption of law that an engine inspected before starting on its trip and found in good condition remained in such condition during the trip[10] It is also a legitimate conclusion that a heavily loaded train laboring up a grade will throw out sparks.[11] No presumption of negligence arises from the mere fact that sparks are generated from the use of coal in a locomotive.[12]

(a) Majority Rule

aa. In general

bb. Rebuttal of presumption

aa. In General

Generally, in an action to recover for injuries by fire set out by a railroad, a prima facie case is made out when the plaintiff shows that the fire was caused by a locomotive belonging to the railroad company, and the defendant then has the burden of showing that it was free from negligence in the construction, equipment, or management of the locomotive.

As a general rule, sometimes by virtue of statute, where plaintiff has shown that the fire resulting in the injury complained of was caused by sparks or cinders from a locomotive belonging to defendant railroad company, a prima facie case of negligence is thereby made out which places the burden on defendant to show that it was free from negligence in the construction, equipment, or management of the locomotive[13] or that the damage was caused by some agency over which defendant had no control.[14] The reason usually assigned for the rule is that matters connected with the construction, equipment, and operation of locomotives lie peculiarly within the knowledge of the agents and employees of the railroad company and outside that of plaintiff, and that the rule is one of necessity.[15] A further reason deducible from other decisions is that it has been fully demonstrated that, where locomotives are properly constructed and have the proper appliances for preventing the escape of fire and are managed with care, they rarely occasion damage by setting out fire, and that if fire is set out by a locomotive it is an inference of reason that the company has been guilty of negligence.[16]

The rule does not shift the burden of proof on the whole case to defendant[17] and does not modify the general rule which makes it incumbent on plaintiff in the first instance to establish a prima facie case or devolve on defendant the burden of doing more than disproving the prima facie case shown by plaintiff.[18] It is generally held that, in order to overcome the prima facie case made by plaintiff, it is only necessary that defendant should produce enough evidence to counterbalance that by which the prima facie case was made out,[19] and defendant is not required to rebut the prima facie case by a preponderance of the evidence that it was not negligent,[20] although a contrary view has also been taken [21]

The presumption of negligence which arises on proof that the fire was ignited by sparks from a railroad engine is an alternative presumption that the railroad was negligent either in operating the locomotive or in constructing and equipping it.[22] So, where only one of these forms of negligence is alleged, the presumption cannot be utilized.[23]

The presumption is, of course, not operative until it is established that the fire causing the injury complained of was communicated by a locomotive.[24] In order to support the presumption, the evidence must be such as reasonably to satisfy a jury that the fire was so caused.[25] Evidence which merely tends to show that the fire originated by sparks from a railroad locomotive is insufficient.[26] Nevertheless, the rule applies, although the evidence to establish the origin of the fire is controverted or in dispute[27] or although the evidence in support of, and in denial of, the allegation that the fire was caused by sparks from a locomotive is such that the issue might be decided either way.[28] Plaintiff is entitled to the benefit of the rule, whether or not defendant admits the origin of the fire [29] The rule is not rendered inapplicable by the fact that the evidence that the fire originated from sparks from a locomotive was purely circumstantial.[30]

bb. Rebuttal of Presumption

In an action against a railroad company for damages caused by fire, the presumption arising from evidence that the injury was caused by fire set out by defendant's locomotive is not conclusive and may be rebutted.

In an action against a railroad company for damages caused by fire, the presumption arising from evidence that the injury complained of was caused by fire set out by defendant's locomotive is not a conclusive, but is a rebuttable, presumption [31] The presumption may be rebutted by evidence introduced by plaintiff as well as evidence introduced by defendant.[32] Where the prima facie case made out by evidence showing that the injury complained of was caused by fire from defendant's locomotive is rebutted, the presumption becomes inoperative,[33] and evidence of negligence other than the bare fact that the fire was set out by the locomotive must be produced by plaintiff in order to authorize a recovery.[34] On the other hand, if the company fails to rebut the prima facie case so made, plaintiff is entitled to recover[35] unless it proves that plaintiff himself was guilty of contributory negligence.[36]

The presumption may be rebutted by showing that the injury resulted from some cause or agency over which defendant had no control,[37] or by showing freedom from negligence on the part of the company,[38] or by proof of matters required by law to be observed,[39] as where it is shown that the locomotive which caused the fire was properly constructed and equipped with approved devices and appliances to prevent the escape of fire and sparks and that it was in good repair and efficiently managed and controlled.[40] Nevertheless, for the purpose of rebutting the presumption, the evidence introduced must be as broad as the presumption to which it is opposed,[41] and must satisfactorily rebut every negligent act or omission which might under the circumstances of the case reasonably or naturally have caused the fire.[42]

It must be shown not only that the locomotive was properly constructed and equipped with the most approved appliances and that they were in good repair,[43] or that ordinary care had been exercised to keep them in repair,[44] but also that the locomotive was properly managed and operated by competent servants.[45] The presumption is not rebutted by showing that the locomotive was properly constructed and equipped and that it was in good condition at the time of the injury without further showing that it was carefully managed and controlled by competent servants at the time of the injury,[46] or by showing that the locomotive was carefully managed and controlled without further showing that it was properly constructed and equipped.[47]

Proof that the company used the most approved appliances to prevent the escape of fire and had careful and competent men in charge thereof[48] or that the locomotive was operated at the time of the fire by servants generally competent[49] will not rebut the presumption of negligence unless the railroad shows that its agents employed proper skill and care at the time of the fire. Evidence that the locomotive was supplied with a proper spark arrester is insufficient to rebut the presumption of negligence without proof that such appliance was in good condition and repair at the time of the fire.[50]

(b) Minority Rule

The rule in some jurisdictions is that a presumption of negligence on the part of the railroad company does not arise from the mere fact that the fire was set by one of its locomotives, and that it is incumbent on the plaintiff to prove some act of negligence in the construction, equipment, or management of the locomotive.

The rule in some jurisdictions is that a presumption of negligence on the part of the railroad company does not arise from the mere fact that the fire was set by sparks or cinders from one of its locomotives, and that it is incumbent on plaintiff to prove some act of negligence in the construction, equipment, or management of the locomotive.[51] However, even where this rule obtains, it is not necessary that plaintiff should prove either the specific defect in the locomotive or the particular act of misconduct in its management or operation constituting the negligence,[52] but it is sufficient if he proves facts and circumstances from which the jury might fairly infer that the locomotive was either defective or negligently operated.[53]

In Kentucky

(1) There must be some probative testimony showing defective equipment or improper operation offered by plaintiff and the mere fact of a fire, even though produced by sparks from an engine, is not in itself sufficient to create a presumption of negligence.—Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Bean, 116 S.W.2d 989, 273 Ky. 454—Clemons v. Dawkins Log & Mill Co., 98 S.W.2d 472, 266 Ky. 157.

(2) Where plaintiff establishes the origin of the fire as sparks from the railroad's engine, and that the sparks must have been of considerable size, the railroad must show that the locomotive was equipped as required by statute—Louisville, etc., R. Co. v. Deaton, 294 S.W. 149, 219 Ky. 715.

(3) It has also been held that, when plaintiff proves that the fire was caused by sparks escaping from a railroad locomotive, it is incumbent on the railroad to show to the satisfaction of the jury that its locomotives were equipped as the statute requires.—Cincinnati, etc., R. Co. v. Falconer, 97 S.W. 727, 30 Ky.L. 152.

§ 517. —— Title or Interest in Property

In an action for injuries by fire caused by a railroad, the burden of proof is on the plaintiff to show such title or interest in the property destroyed as will authorize him to recover damages for its destruction.

In an action for injuries by fire caused by a railroad, the burden of proof is on plaintiff to show such title or interest in the property destroyed as will authorize him to recover damages for its destruction.[54] When he has made out a prima facie case, the burden of proof is then cast on defendant to show that the right of recovery for the destruction was in some person other than plaintiff.[55]

§ 518. —— Origin of Fire or Cause of Injury

In an action against a railroad company for damages caused by fire, the burden is on those seeking recovery to show the cause of the fire, and it is not incumbent on the railroad to show how the fire started in order to escape liability.

In an action against a railroad company for damages caused by fire, the burden of proof is on those seeking recovery to show the cause of the fire,[56] and it is not incumbent on the railroad to show how a fire started in order to escape liability[57] The burden of proof is on plaintiff to show that the fire alleged to have caused the injury was started by the railroad's employees, or was communicated to his property by sparks or fire from its locomotives or trains, or by the spread of fire to plaintiff's premises from fire set out on the right of way or other premises of the company, or on lands of others adjacent to its right of way;[58] this fact can never be presumed,[59] and the rule is not affected by statutes which make companies liable for injuries by fires set out by them in the absence of negligence.[60]

It is not necessary, however, to show that any particular locomotive was at fault, but it will be sufficient if the fire is proved to have been set by any locomotive passing over defendant's road[61] The fact that fire springs up on, or in close proximity to, a track soon after the passing of a locomotive, taken in connection with other circumstances, may be sufficient to raise a presumption that the fire was set out by the locomotive,[62] and it has been similarly so held, where the additional circumstances are shown, that there was no other apparent cause for the fire;[63] that there was no other apparent cause for the fire and no fire on the premises or in the vicinity before the passing of the locomotive;[64] that there was no other agency to which the fire could be attributed and that the train was going up grade at the point where the fire was discovered,[65] that the weather was dry and that a wind was blowing from the track toward the

Locomotive as cause

In order to prove case in action against railway company for damage by fire, alleged to have been set by locomotive, plaintiff must show that fire originated within reasonable distance from railroad track, that grass or other material on or reasonably near right of way was sufficiently dry to be set on fire by live spark or coal, and that fire occurred within reasonable time after locomotive passed.—Hicks v. Chicago & N. W. Ry. Co., 255 N.W. 73, 215 Wis. 462.

Ignitable temperature of cinders

In action against railroad for fire loss allegedly caused by blowing of cinders, property owner need not prove that cinders were of ignitable temperature at time of their trespass, but only that cinders came from a nearby offender guilty of some imprudent act, in unusual quantity or sizes, and fell on inflammable material, and must present a believable theory of causation after negation of other theories.—Louisville & N. point where the fire was discovered;[66] that the weather was dry, that a strong wind was blowing from the track to the house burned, that the roof of the house was easy to ignite, that the fire originated in the roof, and that there had been no fire in, or about, the house for twelve hours or more;[67] or that the company had negligently left along its track combustible material which was discovered to be on fire soon after the passing of the train.[68]

On the other hand, it has been held that the mere passing of a locomotive and the discovery of the fire near the track shortly thereafter is not of itself sufficient to support a presumption that it was caused by fire escaping from the locomotive[69] Also the fact that employees of the company aided in putting out the fire raises no presumption that the company set out the fire.[70]

§ 519. —— Breach of Duty

In an action against a railroad company for damages caused by fire, the plaintiff must show that the act resulting in the injury constituted a breach of duty which, under the circumstances, was due to him.

In an action against a railroad company for damages caused by fire, plaintiff must show that the act resulting in the injury complained of constituted a breach of some duty which, under the circumstances, was due to him.[71] Where a railroad seeks to avoid liability for damage to property by fire caused by a railroad on the ground that the owner of the property is a trespasser, the railroad has the burden of proving that affirmative defense.[72]

Generally the burden of proof to establish contributory negligence in actions for injuries caused by fire set out by railroads is on defendant.

In most jurisdictions the burden of proof to establish contributory negligence in actions for injuries caused by fire set out by railroads is on defendant[73] unless such negligence appears from plaintiff's own evidence[74] or may be fairly inferred from the circumstances;[75] and, where there is no evidence on the subject, it is the duty of the court to assume that plaintiff was not guilty of contributory negligence and to instruct the jury to that effect[76] However, in some jurisdictions, the burden of proof is on plaintiff in an action for injuries by fire set out by a railroad company to show that he was free from contributory negligence.[77]

a. In General

The general rules governing the relevancy, materiality, and competency of evidence are applicable in actions against railroad companies to recover for injuries caused by fire set out by them

Rules governing the relevancy, materiality, and competency of evidence in actions generally, considered in Evidence §§ 158–189, and more particularly actions based on negligence, as discussed in Negligence § 221 et seq, apply in actions against railroad companies to recover for injuries caused by fire set out by them.[78] Subject to these rules, in the absence of direct evidence, circumstantial evi-

Contract to maintain fire line
Evidence to establish a contractual obligation on the part of the railroad to maintain a fire line has been held not admissible where such a contractual obligation was not pleaded, and where the owner of the land damaged had no recollection of such a contract—Bellevue Properties v Pennsylvania-Reading Seashore Lines, 54 A.2d 193, 136 N.J.Law 42.

dence is admissible for the purpose of showing[79] or refuting[80] negligence on the part of defendant, or to show the origin of the fire[81] and its extent[82] On these questions, evidence is admissible as to the dryness of the season,[83] the inflammable character of the surface of the intervening country,[84] its connection with plaintiff's land,[85] the strength and direction of the wind,[86] the use at the time of the injury of an excessive amount of steam,[87] the repeated and unusual dropping of coals or excessive and continued emission of sparks,[88] and whether the train was a light or heavy train[89]

Damages. In an action against a railroad for the burning of trees, proof of the value of such trees as a measure of damages may be admissible[90] Where timber which is burned by a fire set out by a railway is immature, evidence that the fire destroyed a certain number of acres of such timber is admissible,[91] and defendant railway may not prove that such timber had no value where the correct measure of damages is the cost of restoring the land.[92]

Settlement of claims for other losses by fire On the issue whether defendant's locomotive caused the fire complained of, evidence that defendant had caused a prior loss to plaintiff's property which it had adjusted is immaterial and irrelevant.[93] The admissibility of evidence with respect to settlements or compromises with third persons is discussed in Evidence § 292.

b. Ownership or Location of Property Injured or Destroyed

In an action for damages caused by a fire set out by a railroad company, competent and relevant evidence is admissible to show the ownership or location of the property injured or destroyed.

In an action for damages caused by a fire set out by a railroad company, competent and relevant evidence is admissible to show the ownership of the property injured or destroyed.[94] Accordingly, in an action for destruction of buildings by fire, parol evidence is competent to show that a deed to the premises by plaintiff, although containing no reservation, did not include the buildings in question.[95] In an action for grain destroyed by fire, evidence that plaintiff raised it on rented land on shares is admissible to show ownership of the grain and that he did not own it all[96] In an action to recover for fencing destroyed by fire, a written agreement between plaintiff and another company to which the

(1) That on several occasions persons had been seen loitering about plaintiff's premises striking matches, that plaintiff's foreman had been seen after the fire in question in possession of certain metal cans which had been exploded, and that plaintiff had in use on its premises an oil stove used to heat a glue pot.—Star Mfg. Co. v. Atlantic Coast Line R. Co., 23 S.E.2d 32, 222 N.C. 330.

Evidence by defendant that at times preceding the fire in question other persons had lighted fires near the damaged property has been held inadmissible.—Breymann v. Pennsylvania, O. & D. R. Co., 183 N.E. 771, 43 Ohio App. 473.

Evidence of possession of property which was injured by a fire communicated from a railroad right of way was admissible where title to such property was alleged in the complaint.—Elliott v. Wilson, 187 S.E. 825, 181 S.C. 406.

Receipts given agent

Where goods had been purchased by an agent for plaintiff, the fact that the agent took receipts in his own name and delivered them to plaintiff without indorsement did not make such receipts inadmissible as showing title in another than plaintiff.—Alabama Great Southern R. evidence tends to show that defendant succeeded, containing statements inconsistent with plaintiff's testimony both as to the ownership and location of the fencing, is admissible.[97] On the other hand, in an action for the destruction by fire of timber on land claimed by plaintiff where defendant did not offer evidence that title to a part of the land was in a third person at the time of the fire, deeds of a prior owner of the land conveying a part of it to a third person are inadmissible in the absence of proof of what land was conveyed by other deeds referred to as sources of the grantor's title in the deed to plaintiff.[98]

Location. In an action for the destruction by fire of timberland claimed by plaintiff, a plat made by a witness, together with his testimony in determining the true location on the ground of the boundary of plaintiff's land, was proper for consideration by the jury, although the plat and evidence did not constitute a bar to plaintiff's right to recover.[99]

c. Physical Possibility of Sparks Setting Out Fire

Where an issue is raised as to whether it was physically possible for sparks or cinders to have been carried far enough to cause the fire in question, evidence as to how high and how far other locomotives of the railroad had been seen to throw other cinders or sparks is admissible.

Where an issue is raised as to whether it was physically possible for sparks or cinders to have been carried far enough to cause the fire in question, evidence as to how high and how far other locomotives of defendant had been seen to throw cinders or sparks,[1] or that other locomotives of defendant had emitted sparks which were carried to a greater distance than those claimed to have destroyed plaintiff's property,[2] is admissible. The limitations as to time of the occurrences, applicable to evidence tending to prove negligence in the operation or equipment of a locomotive, as considered infra § 523, do not apply to evidence offered for this purpose.[3]

d. Fires Not Shown to Have Been Caused by Locomotives or Trains

Evidence of other fires on the line of the defendant railroad is not admissible where it is not shown that such fires were caused by the defendant's locomotives or by the operation of its trains

Evidence that fires had occurred on the line of defendant's road other than the one which destroyed plaintiff's property is not admissible for any purpose where it is not shown that these fires were caused by defendant's locomotives,[4] or that they occurred from the operation of defendant's trains.[5] Evidence of other fires is admissible only by showing them to have seasonably followed in the wake of a locomotive from whose stacks sparks were being emitted.[6]

e. Combustibles on Property of Railroad

Where the defendant railroad is charged with negligence in failing to use ordinary care to keep its right of way free from combustible matter, evidence is admissible to show that the defendant allowed combustible matter to accumulate at the place where the fire in question started.

Inasmuch as it is the duty of a company to use ordinary or reasonable care and diligence to keep its track and right of way reasonably free from combustible matter likely to be ignited from sparks from passing locomotives and communicate fire to the premises of others, as discussed supra § 494, where a defendant is charged with negligence in failing to perform this duty, evidence is admissible to show that defendant allowed combustible material to accumulate on its right of way or other property at the place where the fire causing the injury started,[7] except where there is uncontradicted evidence that the fire was set out on plaintiff's land and not on the right of way.[8] Evidence that the right of way and track at points other than that at which the fire in question was set out, but in the same locality, were encumbered with combustible material, is admissible as tending to show negligence in failing to keep the track and right of way clear of such materials at the point where the fire started.[9] So, evidence that there was combustible material on the right of way may be shown as bearing on the degree of care necessary in operating the locomotive.[10]

Other fires. It has generally been held that, where defendant is charged with negligence in permitting combustible matter to accumulate on its right of way, evidence of other fires at the same place,[11] or at other times before or after, but near the time of the fire in question and at other places in the vicinity of the fire in question,[12] is admissible to prove this fact, but there is some authority to the contrary of the last proposition.[13] So it has been held that evidence of fires near the place in question and about a month before is admissible to show negligence in failing to use proper appliances to prevent the escape of fire.[14]

Escape of fire set out to clear right of way. Where negligence is charged in failing to prevent the escape of fire properly set out to clear the right of way of combustible material, evidence of other fires from the same cause within a few days of the fire in question is proper.[15]

f. Rules, Customs, and Usages

In actions to recover for loss or injury to property by fire set out by a railroad company, evidence of rules adopted by the company for the government of its employees in the train service, and of custom or usage of the defendant, has been held inadmissible.

In actions to recover for loss or injury to property by fire set out by a railroad company, evidence of rules adopted by the company for the government of its employees in the train service has been held not admissible against defendant as not tending to fix the standard of duty to others.[16] Such rules are especially inadmissible where they require the exercise of a greater degree of care from their employees than is required by law.[17]

According to some decisions, evidence of custom or usage of defendant is inadmissible in actions of the character under consideration,[18] and it has been held that evidence of custom or usage of defendant with respect to the construction and condition of its locomotives[19] or the operation of its trains[20] is not admissible, and in a close case the admission of such evidence is ground for reversal.[21] It is not permissible to introduce evidence of usages and customs of other companies as to the equipment of their locomotives,[22] or precautions taken or omitted by them to prevent the escape of fires from their roadbeds.[23] Likewise, it is not permissible for defendant to show, as tending to prove that the fire did not originate from sparks from its locomotive, that it had been the custom for years among farmers in the vicinity to set fire to the underbrush about that season.[24] On the other hand, it has been held that evidence of a general custom of inspecting locomotives and reporting their condition if in bad order and that no report had been made on the locomotive causing the fire for the purpose of showing that it was in good repair is admissible,[25] and that evidence that for a number of years the firemen had been required, and it had been their custom, to inspect the dampers, ash pans, and dump grates of the locomotives before they started on their trips, and had been required to report what, if anything, was needed, is competent on the question of negligence of the company because it has a direct tendency to prove the degree of care used,[26] as well as that testimony of a former engineer that he kept both dampers of the ash pan open except when going over a bridge, and that other engineers for whom he had fired did the same, is admissible to show the habit on defendant's road of running the locomotive with both dampers open.[27] It has been held that evidence that defendant habitually burned wood in its coal-burning locomotives, and that to burn wood in such a locomotive is more dangerous than to burn coal, is admissible, since such evidence would tend to show that defendant was burning wood in the locomotive that caused the injury.[28] Even if a custom of a railroad company can be shown in order to establish the origin of the fire complained of, it would first be necessary to establish the uniformity of the custom.[29]

g. Contributory Negligence

The plaintiff, in order to refute a charge of contributory negligence, may show that the site selected for a building which was burned was reasonably suitable and safe, and that similar property of other persons placed in similar proximity to the track had not been set on fire.

In order to refute a charge of contributory negligence, plaintiff may show that the site selected for the building burned was reasonably suitable and safe[30] and that he acted with prudence and due care to protect his property,[31] or, if he has failed to perform a certain act, that performance would not have afforded him adequate protection in the particular case.[32] Where the property destroyed had been placed on the right of way and defendant sets up a rule forbidding the placing of that kind of property on the right of way, evidence is admissible to show that defendant had waived the rule.[33] As tending to show or refute contributory negligence it is not permissible to introduce evidence of the custom of other persons in the neighborhood,[34] but it is permissible to show that similar property of other persons placed in similar proximity to the track had not been set on fire.[35]

§ 522. —— Construction, Equipment, and Management of Locomotives in General

a. In general
b. Emission of sparks of unusual size or quantity
c. Rate of speed of locomotives
d. Character of fuel used

a. In General

The plaintiff, in order to show negligence in the construction or management of a locomotive, may introduce evidence tending to show that it was in bad condition or improperly handled at the time of the fire. The defendant may show that for some time before and after the fire the locomotive was in good condition.

As tending to show negligence in the construction, equipment, repair, or management of the locomotive causing the fire, plaintiff may introduce evidence tending to show that it was in bad condition or improperly handled at the time of the fire.[36] Within reasonable limits as to time, he may show that before or after the time of the fire complained of the locomotive was defectively constructed or equipped.[37] Where the locomotive which set out the fire causing the injury complained of is not identified, evidence as to the condition generally of the locomotives used by defendant on its roads is admissible.[38] It has also been held that, where all of the engines of a railroad were substantially alike, evidence of the condition of the locomotive involved, and of what the other engines would do in respect of emitting sparks, is admissible.[39] In order to show that defendant had been negligent in not providing the best appliances for arresting sparks, it is not error to admit evidence of an expert in the employ of another company that at the time of the fires in question a certain device to prevent the emission of sparks was in use on his road and that with proper use and handling he had never known of a fire caused by a locomotive so equipped.[40]

On the other hand, plaintiff should not be permitted to exhibit to the jury a defective spark arrester found on defendant's road where it passed through plaintiff's premises some weeks before the fire complained of, where the evidence conclusively showed that it could not have been used on that occasion.[41] Specimens of wire netting used on spark arresters and procured from defendant's shops are inadmissible where there is no proof that this kind was used on the locomotives at the time, and the wire netting was procured two or three years after the fire[42] So, on the question whether the spark arresters used by defendant were of the required standard, it is not permissible to show that defendant was in the habit of refusing to adopt certain appliances to modify the discharge of smoke from its locomotives, because of the cost, until after the patents on them had expired[43]

In order to refute negligence in the construction and equipment of the locomotive charged to have caused the fire, evidence is admissible that for some time before[44] or for some time before and after the fire[45] the locomotive was in good condition, on the theory that a condition once shown is presumed to exist for a reasonable time in the absence of evidence to the contrary.[46] Defendant may show the character of the netting used on its locomotives for arresting sparks,[47] or may compare it with another type,[48] and show that a netting finer than the one actually used on the spark arrester could not be used without interfering with the working capacity of the locomotive.[49] Where there is evidence already in the case that a locomotive on another road with a different spark arrester from that in use on defendant's road had passed near the property destroyed a short time before the fire, and defendant claimed that such locomotive set out the fire, defendant's engineer, after testifying that he was acquainted with the kind of spark arrester used by the other road, should be permitted to testify which of the two locomotives he had observed emitted the largest and most sparks.[50]

b. Emission of Sparks of Unusual Size or Quantity

It may be shown in evidence that at the time of the fire sparks of unusual size were observed to escape from the locomotive as an indication of negligence in the equipment or handling of the locomotive.

In order to show negligence in the equipment or handling of the locomotive which set out the fire causing the injury complained of, it may be shown that at the time of the fire sparks of unusual size or quantity were observed to escape from the locomotive,[51] and, for this purpose, a witness may testify that the locomotive threw out more sparks than he had ever seen thrown out by other locomotives generally,[52] or that he had observed other locomotives of defendant just prior to the fire and that they did not emit as many sparks as the locomotive in question[53] Evidence of the size of cinders found near the place of fire has been held admissible to show that they were comparative in size to those seen emitted from a passing locomotive on the day of the fire.[54] In order to authorize the admission of evidence that the locomotive claimed to have set out the fire emitted sparks of unusual size several months after the fire in question, it is necessary to show either that sparks of that size could be emitted through faults of construction in the locomotive[55] or that the locomotive was in the same condition of repair as when the fire in question occurred.[56]

Where it is alleged that the spark arrester of the locomotive setting out the fire was out of repair, evidence that other locomotives of defendant equipped with similar spark arresters emitted sparks of unusual size is inadmissible to show that the spark arrester of the locomotive in question was out of repair.[57] Where no particular locomotive is identified as having set out the fire, evidence that a few days before the fire a designated locomotive passing plaintiff's premises cast out sparks of unusual size and that a few days thereafter large holes were found in the screen of the spark arrester is admissible.[58] So, also, where the locomotive setting out the fire is not identified, evidence that for several months before and after the fire defendant's locomotives emitted sparks in unusual quantity and size is admissible, where admittedly competent evidence connected such remote conditions to, and tended to establish defendant's negligence with, the fire in question.[59]

In order to refute a charge of negligence based on the emission of sparks of unusual size or in unusual quantities, defendant may show that at the place where the fire occurred the grade was steep and that by reason thereof the locomotive necessarily emitted sparks of unusual size and quantity.[60]

c. Rate of Speed of Locomotives

Evidence of the rapid speed of the locomotive setting out the fire at the time and place of the fire is admissible as tending to show that more fire than usual was being used and that its escape was more probable. Where a statute makes a company liable for injuries sustained by running its trains in excess of a prescribed limit, the statute is admissible on the question of negligence in the running of the train.

Evidence of the rapid speed of the locomotive setting out the fire at the time and place of the fire is admissible as tending to show that more fire than usual was being used and that its escape was more probable,[61] although it has been held that evidence of the speed of such locomotive at a point a mile and a half or two miles from the scene of the fire is irrelevant and inadmissible.[62] Where it is shown that, at the time of the fire, the train was running several miles in excess of the rate fixed by the company's timetable several years later, and there is no evidence to show that there was any change in the condition of the roadbed and the traffic between the two dates that would affect the speed of its trains, and no apparent reason why a greater speed was permissible at one time than at another, the timetable is admissible as tending to show what defendant regarded as a reasonable rate of speed at the time of the fire and that the rate of speed of the train was unreasonable and excessive.[63]

Rate in excess of prescribed limit. Where a statute makes a company liable for injuries sustained by running its trains in excess of a prescribed limit, the statute is admissible on the question of negligence in the running of the train[64] It has been held that evidence that defendant's trains were usually run past the place where the fire originated at a greater rate of speed than allowed by ordinance is admissible,[65] and that an ordinance regulating the speed of locomotives in a city is admissible on the issue of whether defendant negligently exceeded the speed limit, thus causing a greater volume of sparks to be emitted by the greater exhaust occasioned,[66] but there is also authority to the effect that, in actions of the character under consideration, a municipal ordinance is not admissible for any purpose.[67]

On the question of whether the defendant was negligent in not using oil instead of coal for fuel, it may be shown that other railroads had reduced the number of their oil-burning locomotives and increased the number burning coal.

On an issue as to whether defendant was negligent in not using oil as a fuel instead of coal, evidence that two other railroad lines had from year to year reduced the number of their oil-burning locomotives and increased the number burning coal has been held admissible where it is shown that such roads, with defendant, formed a portion of one system of railways and have but one fuel agent for the entire system.[68] It has been held that evidence that the coal used in defendant's locomotives burned slowly and retained fire for a considerable length of time is relevant and material.[69]

b. Evidence offered in rebuttal
c. Limitations on admissibility of evidence

a. Evidence Offered in Chief

(1) Where locomotive causing injury is not identified
(2) Where locomotive causing injury is identified

(1) Where Locomotive Causing Injury Is Not Identified

Where the identity of the locomotive which set out the fire causing the injury complained of is not established, evidence that the defendant's locomotives had set out fires or had emitted sparks or coals capable of setting out fires may be admissible The defendant may show that all the locomotives which passed the plaintiff's place at the time of the fire were in good order, and well supplied with proper appliances.

Where the identity of the locomotive which set out the fire causing the injury complained of is not established, evidence that defendant's locomotives had set out fires or had emitted sparks or coals capable of setting out fires may be admissible, as tending to show the possibility, and consequent probability, that the fire causing the injury complained of was set out by a locomotive of defendant,[70] and for the purpose of showing a negligent habit on the part of defendant in respect of the construction, equipment, and management of its locomotives, and, therefore, as tending to show negligence in that respect in the particular case causing the injury.[71] This class of evidence, it has been said, "is exceptional in character at the best,"[72] and not satisfactory in many ways,[73] and is admissible as a matter of necessity because of the failure of direct proof,[74] and as the best[75] and only[76] evidence that the nature of the case admits of. It has also been held that the fact that one of two or more locomotives caused the fire does not constitute an identification of the locomotive setting out the fire so as to take the case out of the foregoing rule.[77] The mere fact that a locomotive was attached to a particular train on a certain occasion has been held not to constitute specific identification of the locomotive,[78] and a mere allegation that the property was fired by a locomotive which passed at a time specified does not so identify the locomotive as to take the case out of the rule.[79] Nevertheless, evidence that defendant's locomotives emitted hot cinders of ordinary size is not admissible where there is no evidence to show that such cinders either caused or could have caused any fires.[80]

Where there is no evidence of the emission of sparks by locomotives at or near the time of the fire, it is not permissible to show acts of a similar character before and after the fire for the purpose of establishing the cause of the fire resulting in the injury complained of[81] It has also been held that evidence is not admissible that a locomotive of the company shortly before or after the day on which the particular fire occurred had set out other fires, where there is no evidence to show that the locomotive was run on the day when the fire in question was set out.[82] Evidence that locomotives operated on another railroad running through the same county threw sparks sufficient to fire rubbish and other inflammable materials can throw no light on the question whether the fire complained of was caused by defendant's locomotives or to show negligence on defendant's part.[83]

Where the locomotive causing the injury is not identified, it is permissible for defendant to show that all the locomotives which passed plaintiff's place at the time of the fire were in good order and well supplied with proper appliances,[84] and properly operated,[85] but it is not admissible for defendant to show, although it is shown that the type of spark arrester with which the locomotive was equipped was in general use and approved by experience, that on another railroad using the same kind of appliances at the same time fires occurred from sparks emitted from the smokestack [86]

(2) Where Locomotive Causing Injury Is Identified

(a) Fires set out or emission of coal or sparks by locomotive identified

(b) Fires set out or emission of coal or sparks by other locomotives

(a) Fires Set Out or Emission of Coal or Sparks by Locomotive Identified

Where a fire was caused by a locomotive which is known and identified, evidence may be admissible that the locomotive had at other times and places set out other fires or had emitted sparks or coals capable of causing fires for the purpose of establishing that the fire was caused by such locomotive, or for the purpose of showing that at the time of the injury it was improperly constructed, equipped, or operated.

Where it is claimed and in the nature of the case the fire could only have been caused by a locomotive which is known and identified, evidence is admissible, within reasonable limits as to time and place, that the locomotive had at other times and places set out other fires or had emitted sparks or coals capable of causing fires, for the purpose of establishing the fact that the fire was caused by such locomotive.[87]

Where the fire is shown to have been caused, or in the nature of the case could only have been caused, by a locomotive which is known and identified, evidence is admissible, within reasonable limits as to time and place, to show that the locomotive had at other times and places, before or after the fire complained of, set out other fires,[88] or emitted sparks or coals capable of causing fire,[89] or to show that it was in a defective condition prior to, and at the time of, the fire,[90] for the purpose of showing that at the time of the injury it was improperly constructed, equipped, or operated. It has also been held that evidence is admissible that the locomotive in question emitted sparks when it was running upgrade, although the grade along which the property was burned was substantially level.[91]

In behalf of defendant, it may be shown by relevant testimony that the fire originated from other independent causes,[92] even if the circumstantial evidence introduced by plaintiff seems to be clear that the cause of the fire must have been sparks emitted by the locomotive.[93] Defendant may show that the locomotive alleged to have caused the fire had been examined seventeen days before the fire by an expert machinist and found to be in proper condition, properly equipped, etc,[94] but for the purpose of overcoming evidence that the fire was caused by defendant's locomotive, it is not permissible to show that plaintiff's son, who was at home when the fire occurred, had, when a boy, acquired a disposition to set incendiary fires, and had done so.[95]

(b) Fires Set Out or Emission of Coal or Sparks by Other Locomotives

In some, but not other, jurisdictions where the locomotive which set out the fire is known and identified, evidence in actions to recover for such injury should be confined to the condition of that particular locomotive.

In a number of jurisdictions, where the locomotive which set out the fire causing the injury is known or identified, evidence in actions to recover for such injury should be confined to the condition, management, and operation of that particular locomotive,[96] and evidence that other locomotives of the company at other times and places had set out fires or emitted sparks or coals capable of setting fires is not admissible either to show negligence of the company in the construction, equipment, or management of the locomotive which caused the fire or to show the possibility and consequent probability that the fire was set by such locomotive.[97] This rule has been followed, even though such other locomotives had the same kind of appliances as the locomotive in question,[98] but it has also been held that, where all of a railroad's engines were substantially alike, evidence that other engines had been seen to emit sparks is admissible as evidence,[99] and, where the identified engine is not differentiated from other engines of defendant but is similar to them in equipment, inspection, and operation, proof of fires from such other engines may be admissible.[1] Evidence of other fires set out by locomotives of the railroad has been held admissible to show the possible distance burning substances thrown off a locomotive may be carried and a fire set thereby.[2]

In some jurisdictions, where the common-law rule of liability for fires set out by locomotives still prevails, apparently no distinction is made between identified and unidentified locomotives in respect of the admissibility of this class of evidence; in other words, if the evidence would be admissible in case of an identified locomotive, it would also be admissible in case of an unidentified locomotive, both to show negligence and the possibility, and consequent probability, that the fire was set out by the identified locomotive.[3] Where the common-law liability is changed by statute making railroad companies liable for injuries by fire set out by their locomotives, although not negligent, as considered supra §§ 485–489, it is held that, even though the locomotive causing the fire is identified, it is permissible to show for the purpose of establishing the fact that the fire causing the injury was set out by such locomotive that other locomotives of the company at other occasions had set out fires or emitted sparks or coals capable of setting out fires.[4]

b. Evidence Offered in Rebuttal

Where the defendant introduces evidence that its locomotives were properly equipped to prevent the escape of sparks and coals, and that a fire could not have originated therefrom, the plaintiff may introduce evidence to show that on other occasions locomotives of the defendant had set out fires or thrown out coals and sparks capable of setting fires.

Whether or not the locomotive alleged to have caused the fire was identified, where defendant introduces evidence that a designated locomotive was, or that all its locomotives were, properly equipped to prevent the escape of sparks and coals, and that a fire could not have originated from its locomotives, plaintiff may introduce in rebuttal evidence to show that on other occasions a particular locomotive or that other locomotives of defendant had set out fires or had thrown out sparks and coals capable of setting fires.[5] There is, it is said, no other practical way to rebut evidence of this character.[6] It has been held that, where defendant introduced expert evidence that its locomotives as equipped could not throw sparks as far as the property claimed to have been set on fire by defendant's locomotive, evidence is admissible in rebuttal to show that its locomotives had set out fires at even greater distances, although such fires were remote in point of time and place, and an objection to the evidence on this ground goes to its weight and not to its admissibility.[7] Where a defendant railroad introduced expert testimony that particular engines would not cause fire, evidence consisting of testimony of laymen that they had seen engines of the type involved set out fires has been held admissible.[8]

c. Limitations on Admissibility of Evidence

(1) As to time and place
(2) As to similarity of construction, equipment, repair, and management
(3) Other limitations

(1) As to Time and Place

Evidence tending to show that the defendant's locomotives set out fires or emitted sparks or coals capable of setting out fires but which does not fix a definite time is inadmissible. Generally, evidence of other fires should be confined to instances at or near the place of the fire in question.

Although, as discussed supra this section, evidence is admissible to show that defendant's locomotives set out fires or emitted sparks or coals capable of setting out fires either before or after the fire complained of, evidence which does not fix a definite time is inadmissible.[9] Although no exact standard can be laid down as to the period of time it will be proper to embrace in the inquiry,[10] and reasonable latitude must be allowed because the purpose of such proofs would be defeated if they were confined to the precise or exact time of the occurrence,[11] the evidence should be limited in point of time to facts having some probative value,[12] and it has very generally been declared that evidence that locomotives of defendant had on other occasions set out fires or emitted sparks or coals capable of setting out fires must be limited to occurrences "at or about", or "at or near",[13] or "shortly before or after",[14] the time when the fire complained of occurred, or within a "reasonable time" thereof.[15] In accordance with the particular facts and circumstances, it has been held that evidence of fires or the emission of sparks capable of setting out fires[16] at other times is or is not[17] admissible. It has been held that no exception is warranted because the evidence shows a continuous series of similar acts and occurrences for years before the fire complained of, thus indicating a perpetuation of faulty conditions originally existing;[18] but a contrary view has also been taken[19]

Place. It has generally been held that evidence of the character under consideration should be confined to other fires or emissions of sparks and coals at or near the place of the fire causing the injury complained of,[20] and that evidence that defendant's locomotives emitted sparks at other places not definitely located is inadmissible.[21]

(2) As to Similarity of Construction, Equipment, Repair, and Management

According to some, but not other, decisions, in order to render applicable the rule authorizing the admission of evidence of the setting out of fires or the emission of sparks by the defendant's locomotives on other occasions, it is not essential to show that the locomotives were of the same or similar construction as the locomotive in question.

According to some decisions, in order to render applicable the rule authorizing the admission of evidence of the setting out of fires or the emission of sparks or cinders capable of setting out fires by defendant's locomotives on other occasions, it is not essential to show that the locomotives were of the same or similar construction, equipment, state of repair, and management as those supposed to have set out the fire or in use at the time of the fire complained of.[22] However, many decisions hold directly to the contrary[23]

(3) Other Limitations

It has been held that evidence that on other occasions the defendant's locomotives had set out fires or emitted sparks capable of setting fires is not admissible unless it is shown that conditions were the same as at the time of the fire in question.

According to some decisions, evidence that defendant's locomotives had on other occasions set out fires or emitted sparks or coals capable of setting out fires is not admissible unless it is shown that conditions were the same as at the time of the fire in question.[24] On the other hand, other decisions hold that, in order to render this evidence admissible, it is not essential to show that the condition of the weather or the direction of the wind was the same;[25] and any difference merely affects the pro-

bative force of the evidence and not its admissibility.[26]

A witness need not have seen sparks fall from an engine of the railroad in order to be qualified to testify as to the origin of other fires, but his testimony is admissible if he states circumstances tending to show with reasonable certainty that the railroad was responsible for other fires in the same locality.[27] Evidence which only creates an inference that defendant set out a prior fire cannot be used as evidence that defendant set out the fire in question.[28]

§ 524. —— Competency and Qualification of Employees

As tending to show that the defendant's locomotive was operated carefully at the time of the fire, evidence that the fireman and engineer in charge of the locomotive which allegedly caused the fire were careful men may be admissible.

As tending to show that defendant's locomotive was operated in a careful and prudent manner at the time of the fire, evidence is admissible to show that defendant's fireman and engineer in charge of the locomotive alleged to have caused the fire were careful and prudent men,[29] for which purpose testimony of a member of the board of examiners may be material and relevant.[30] However, it has been held that expert testimony as to the character of defendant's employees for care and prudence is inadmissible.[31] Where the competency of the engineer is not in issue, evidence that he was in the habit of exercising care and caution in operating his locomotive is inadmissible to show that on the occasion in question he managed and controlled his locomotive prudently.[32]

§ 525. —— Subsequent Repairs or Precautions

Evidence of subsequent repairs or precautions by the defendant railroad company has been held admissible on the question of its antecedent negligence with respect to a fire allegedly caused by its locomotives, but there is also authority to the contrary.

In some jurisdictions it has been held that evidence of subsequent repairs to a locomotive which is alleged to have caused the injury,[33] or to the right of way,[34] or of additional precautions, as in the employment of more men,[35] is admissible on the question of antecedent negligence of defendant. In other jurisdictions, however, it has been held that since acts which follow the injury cannot be proved to establish antecedent negligence,[36] the mere fact that a locomotive alleged to have set a fire is subsequently repaired cannot be considered in determining whether or not it was defective at the time the fire was set.[37] The fact that employees of the railroad company materially assisted in putting out the fire will not be considered.[38]

§ 526. —— Insurance of Property Injured or Destroyed

Generally, evidence that property destroyed by a fire set out by a railroad locomotive had been insured is inadmissible. Evidence of a subrogation or an indemnity agreement between the owner of such property and an insurer is inadmissible.

Where the fact that the property had been insured or that the insurance had been paid constitutes no defense to an action for the destruction of property by fire set out by a railroad company, as considered supra § 512, evidence to show that the property destroyed had been insured is generally not admissible,[39] although such evidence may be admissible in support of the defense that plaintiff burnt the property himself.[40] Evidence of a subrogation agreement between the owner of the property and an insurance company transferring to the latter the owner's right of action to the extent of the amount insured,[41] or of an agreement between the owner and insurer that the latter would pay the costs in the event that plaintiff fails in the suit,[42] is not admissible.

§ 527. Weight and Sufficiency of Evidence

a In general
b. Origin or cause of fire
c. Negligence

a. In General

General rules of evidence apply to the weight and sufficiency of evidence in actions against railroad companies for destruction of, or injury to, property by fire set out by them.

Rules applicable to the weight and sufficiency of evidence in civil actions generally, as considered in Evidence §§ 1016–1050, and actions based on negligence, as discussed in Negligence §§ 243–250, apply in actions against railroad companies for destruction of, or injury to, property by fire set out by them.[43]

Title or right to sue. General rules governing the weight and sufficiency of evidence apply in determining whether plaintiff has such title or interest in the property injured or destroyed by fire as will entitle him to maintain an action for the resulting damages.[44] Plaintiff need not produce written evidence of title, but possession under claim of ownership either by himself[45] or by a tenant[46] is sufficient proof of title to authorize him to maintain an action for damages in the absence of evidence showing ownership in another. However, a mere oral statement of plaintiff that he claimed the property in question is insufficient to establish title thereto.[47]

b. Origin or Cause of Fire

(1) In general
(2) Degree of proof

(1) In General

Under general rules of evidence which apply with respect to the weight and sufficiency of the proof of the origin of fires, circumstantial evidence to show that a fire was set out by a railroad may be sufficient, although evidence which raises a mere conjecture that the railroad set out the fire is insufficient.

General rules governing the weight and sufficiency of evidence apply with respect to the proof of the origin or cause of fires.[48] In order to show that the fire causing the injury was originated or caused by defendant, circumstantial, as well as direct, evidence showing that it was communicated from a fire set out by defendant on its right of way or other premises or was communicated from one of defendant's locomotives may be sufficient,[49] because in cases of this character it is ordinarily difficult or even impossible to furnish anything but evidence of a circumstantial nature to show this fact.[50] Thus, such evidence may be sufficient where it shows that there was no probable cause or reasonable explanation for the fire except the company's locomotive,[51] as where it is established by proof that the fire started immediately or soon after one of defendant's locomotives had passed and that there was no other apparent cause for the fire,[52] especially when taken together with other circumstances tending to strengthen the probability that the fire so originated,[53] such as evidence of other fires from defendant's locomotives at about the same place and time,[54] the scattering of sparks or coals on the same or other occasions,[55] combustible material on the right of way,[56] the direction of the wind at the time from the locomotive toward the property burned,[57] that the property burned was located near the railroad track,[58] and that there was no fire in the building at the time.[59]

Where the evidence as to the origin of the fire is circumstantial, a recovery cannot be based on proof of a mere possibility that the fire was originated or caused by defendant or on proof that it raises a mere conjecture, guess, or suspicion that the fire was so caused.[60] Circumstantial evidence to establish the origin or cause of a fire claimed to have been set out by a railroad company should be sufficient to establish a reasonable and well grounded inference that the fire was so set out,[61] and should be such as to rebut the probability of the fire having originated in any other manner.[62]

Where the evidence is insufficient to establish a direct causal connection between the fire resulting in the injury complained of and the operation of the road, it is insufficient to sustain a finding that the property was fired by defendant's locomotive,[63] and a judgment awarding damages for the property burned will be reversed.[64] It is not necessary, however, that the evidence to establish the fact that defendants set out the fire should be uncontradicted.[65]

Effect of uncontradicted evidence in rebuttal. Circumstantial evidence that a locomotive set out the fire causing the injury complained of will not be sufficient to authorize a recovery where there is other positive and uncontradicted evidence tending to exclude the probability that the fire was caused by such locomotive [66]

(2) Degree of Proof

It is essential to a recovery that the plaintiff show by the preponderance of the evidence that the defendant caused the fire resulting in the injury complained of; it is not necessary to show absolute certainty that the defendant originated the fire.

It is essential to a recovery that plaintiff should show by a preponderance of the evidence that defendant caused the fire resulting in the injury complained of.[67] If the evidence preponderates against the claim that defendant caused the fire[68] or is equally balanced,[69] there can be no recovery. Nevertheless, a preponderance of evidence is sufficient; the law does not require demonstration or absolute certainty that the fire was originated by defendant[70] or that this fact should be proved beyond a reasonable doubt,[71] or that the evidence should be of such weight as to exclude all possibility of another origin of the fire.[72]

c. Negligence

(2) Construction, equipment, and operation of locomotives
(3) Allowing accumulation of combustible matter on railroad property
(4) Setting out and preventing spread of fire
(5) Contributory negligence

(1) In General

Where negligence is the basis of the action, it is necessary for the plaintiff to establish negligence on the part of the defendant by a preponderance of the evidence in order to authorize a recovery. This evidence of the defendant's negligence may be circumstantial

Except in jurisdictions where negligence has been eliminated as an element of the cause of action by statute, as considered supra §§ 485–489, where negligence is the basis of the action,[73] it is necessary for plaintiff to establish negligence on the part of defendant by a preponderance of the evidence in order to authorize a recovery,[74] and a judgment for plaintiff is not authorized where the evidence is evenly balanced[75] or is sufficient only to raise a mere conjecture or surmise that the fire which destroyed plaintiff's property was due to defendant's negligence,[76] although, in accordance with well settled principles, as considered in Evidence § 1020, it is not necessary to prove negligence beyond a reasonable doubt.[77] This evidence of defendant's negligence may be either direct or circumstantial, or both,[78] whether the evidence is produced in making out the case in chief or offered by way of rebuttal.[79] Likewise, it is not essential to the sufficiency of circumstantial evidence to authorize a recovery that it should be undisputed.[80] In accordance with the foregoing principles, evidence of defendant's negligence has been held sufficient[81] or insufficient.[82]

(2) Construction, Equipment, and Operation of Locomotives

It may be shown by circumstantial evidence that the defendant was negligent in equipping or operating its locomotives. In order to authorize a recovery on evidence of such negligence, it is not necessary that the evidence be undisputed.

The fact that defendant was negligent in causing the fire by reason of its negligently constructing, equipping, repairing,[83] or operating[84] its locomotives may be shown wholly by circumstantial evidence offered either in chief or in rebuttal.[85] Such negligence may be sufficiently proved, at least to warrant an inference that the fire was caused by such negligence, by evidence, together with other circumstances, that about or soon before the time at which the fire occurred passing locomotives emitted sparks or coals of an unusual quantity or size,[86] or to an unusual height or distance,[87] or that the locomotive alleged to have caused the fire had cast sparks prior to the time of the fire in question,[88] or had emitted fire for a considerable time,[89] or had started other fires,[90] and that a locomotive in good repair and equipment would not have caused fire in the manner, or at the place, in which the one in question was caused.[91]

In order to authorize a recovery on evidence of this character, it not necessary that it should be undisputed, and the jury may find a verdict for plaintiff, although there is direct and positive testimony in behalf of defendant that the locomotive was properly constructed, equipped, and in good repair,[92] that the engineer was competent,[93] and that the locomotive was carefully and skillfully operated at the time of the fire,[94] even though there was no direct testimony contradicting evidence of this character.[95] Where it is shown that the appliances used by the company have been in use many years and found sufficient to protect its own and other property, evidence introduced by plaintiff to show that the appliances were defective or were improperly or negligently used must be positive, strong, and convincing.[96] The jury have the undoubted right to weigh both the circumstantial evidence of plaintiff and the direct testimony in behalf of defendant and determine the value of each,[97] and have the right to say that the circumstantial evidence tending to prove negligence outweighs the direct evidence for defendant to the contrary.[98] However, it has been held that, where defendant relies on the fact that its locomotive was in good condition, it is not necessary to sustain a verdict for defendant that the evidence by which it proves that fact be undisputed.[99] Even though direct testimony that the locomotive was in good order and carefully operated is not contradicted, the jury need not accept such evidence as conclusive, but may consider all the evidence bearing on the condition of the locomotive and the mode of operating it and the circumstances under which the fire occurred[1]

(3) Allowing Accumulation of Combustible Matter on Railroad Property

The fact that a fire was caused by the defendant's negligence may be shown by evidence that it permitted combustible material to accumulate on its right of way together with other circumstances.

The fact that the fire was caused by defendant's negligence may be shown by evidence that it permitted dry grass, weeds, or other combustible material to accumulate on its right of way, in which the fire started, together with other circumstances,[2] such as, that there was a steep grade at the place of the fire so that defendant's locomotives in passing put on steam and emitted sparks and coals which frequently ignited the rubbish on the right of way,[3] that at the time of the fire the weather was very dry,[4] that a strong wind was blowing toward the property destroyed,[5] that fires had previously been set out in the property destroyed by passing locomotives,[6] or that the fire in question was communicated through the agency of the combustible material to the property destroyed[7] These facts may be established by circumstantial evidence[8] since it is seldom possible to produce eyewitnesses to testify to such facts directly.[9]

Violation of statute requiring corporation operating steam railroad between the first of April and December to keep full width of its locations over which engines are operated clear of inflammable material to a point a designated number of feet distant from center line is evidence of negligence as to all consequences intended to be prevented, which includes protection of other property against damage by fire, notwithstanding no penalty is prescribed for its violation.—Carbone v. the defendant's right of way, evidence that its employees did not use proper precautionary means in setting out and guarding the fire may be sufficient to sustain a verdict for the plaintiff.

While negligence on the part of defendant in setting out and allowing the fire to escape from its right of way cannot be inferred from the mere fact that a fire broke out on adjacent property,[10] or from the fact that at the time of the fire the employees whose duty it was to keep the road where the fire occurred in repair were absent,[11] where the fire is shown to have been set out on defendant's right of way, evidence that its employees did not use proper precautions in setting out and guarding the fire may be sufficient to sustain a verdict for plaintiff.[12] Evidence of such negligence has been held to be sufficient to justify the inference that men burning off right of way were defendant's servants,[13] to show negligence in failure to prevent the spread of fire set out on the right of way to clear off combustibles,[14] to show negligence both in setting out fire on, and preventing the spread of fire from, combustible matter on the right of way,[15] and to show that negligence in burning combustibles on the right of way caused the destruction of plaintiff's property by fire;[16] and to be insufficient to show negligence in preventing the spread of fire from combustible matter on the right of way,[17] to show negligence in failing to prevent the spread of fire set out on the right of way to clear off combustibles,[18] and to show negligence in starting a fire on the right of way to burn off combustibles.[19]

(5) Contributory Negligence

General rules applicable to the weight and sufficiency of evidence apply on the question of contributory negligence in actions against railroads for destruction of, or injury to, property by fire.

§ 528. Questions of Law and Fact

In an action for injuries from fire caused by a railroad, the case should be submitted to the jury where the plaintiff has proved a prima facie cause of action.

In an action for injuries from a fire caused by a railroad, the case should be submitted to the jury where plaintiff has proved a prima facie cause of action,[21] since the right of plaintiff to a submission of his case to the jury depends basically on the strength and substance of the evidence, together with all reasonable inferences, produced by his own side, regardless of the contrasting strength and substance of the evidence produced by the railroad.[22] A directed verdict should not be granted where the evidence shows a conflict as to whether the cause of action pleaded has been proved[23] or where the testimony that the parties have been permitted to introduce leaves any fact material to an issue in substantial dispute,[24] and it is erroneous to direct a verdict in favor of defendant where the evidence and inferences properly deducible therefrom are sufficient to authorize a verdict for plaintiff.[25] However, where the countervailing facts and circumstances are so clear and convincing that no reasonable person could doubt their verity and effectiveness, the case should not be submitted to the jury.[26]

On an issue as to the physical possibility for a locomotive to have set out a fire, the question is one for the determination of the jury,[27] and ordinarily the question as to the amount of damages to be awarded is one for the jury.[28] However if there is an entire absence of evidence that plaintiff sustained any damage, it is error to submit the question to the jury.[29] Also, whether the railroad was absolved from liability for fire damage by reason of notices restricting liability, in the face of evidence of a custom to the contrary, has been held to be properly an issue for the jury.[30]

Construction of contracts. The construction of contracts exempting railroad companies from liability for injuries by fires set out by them is a question of law for the court and should not be left to the jury,[31] and accordingly the court should determine as a matter of law whether the property injured is within the terms of the contract.[32]

§ 529. —— Origin of Fire

Ordinarily, in actions for injury by fire alleged to have been caused by a railroad company, the origin of the fire is a question of fact to be determined by the triers of fact from all the evidence in the case.

sitting without a jury,[34] from all the evidence in the case. Thus it has been held that the question of the origin of the fire is for the determination of the jury where the evidence on this question is conflicting;[35] where different inferences can be drawn from the evidence;[36] where the evidence is sufficient to support an inference that the fire originated on defendant's right of way,[37] or by sparks from defendant's locomotive,[38] and was communicated to the property destroyed or injured; where the only reasonable inference to be drawn from the evidence is that the fire complained of was communicated by fire from defendant's locomotive;[39] where the evidence tends to show a probability that the fire causing the injury was communicated from a fire started on defendant's right of way,[40] or from one of its locomotives,[41] and that there was no other probable cause for the fire;[42] where the evidence shows that fire communicated from defendant's locomotive was the most probable and reasonable source of the origin of the fire complained of;[43] where the evidence has a fair tendency to justify the conclusion that the fire causing the injury was set by a locomotive,[44] or where the evidence that the fire was started by locomotive sparks fairly negatives any other source from which the fire could have come.[45]

Plaintiff is not required to introduce direct evidence that the fire originated on the railroad right of way in order to take the question of the responsibility of the railroad for the fire to the jury.[46] Where no eyewitnesses were present, plaintiff, in order to raise the question for the jury as to whether the fire causing the damage was set by sparks from a locomotive, must show circumstantial evidence sufficiently strong to make sparks from an engine the probable origin of the fire, and reasonably eliminate the probability of any other origin.[47] Moreover, the circumstantial evidence must be sufficient to induce in the minds of reasonable men the conclusion that the fire did so originate,[48] and must have sufficient probative force to justify a finding that the fire originated from the engine[49] before the issue can be submitted to the jury.

On the other hand, the case should not be submitted to the jury where the evidence is such that the origin of the fire is wholly a matter of conjecture,[50] or where at most it shows a bare possibility that the fire might have been caused by defendant's locomotive,[51] and is insufficient to show that there is any probability that it was so caused,[52] or where the evidence as to the origin of the fire is such that only one conclusion can be drawn therefrom by reasonable minds[53]

Where the evidence wholly fails to connect the railroad with the fire which destroyed plaintiff's property, a verdict for defendant should be directed,[54] and defendant is entitled to a peremptory charge[55] Also, the court may properly direct a verdict for defendant where the evidence is such that the origin of the fire is a mere matter of conjecture or speculation as to whether or not defendant's locomotive caused the fire,[56] or where, at most, it shows a bare possibility that the fire might have been so caused.[57] On the other hand, the case should not be withdrawn from the jury where there is substantial evidence that the fire was caused by defendant's locomotive;[58] and where the evidence is sufficient to afford an inference that defendant caused the fire in question an affirmative charge in favor of defendant should not be given.[59]

Motion for nonsuit should be denied where the evidence, although circumstantial, authorizes a finding that the fire was communicated by defendant's locomotive,[60] or where there is evidence from which the jury could find that sparks fell on the right of way and that the fire was thence communicated to plaintiff's property.[61] However, there is no error in awarding a nonsuit where the evidence, at most, merely raises a suspicion or conjecture that the fire was caused by sparks from an engine which had passed, and does not authorize a reasonable inference that the fire was set out by the railroad's engine,[62] and a nonsuit should be granted where no connection is shown between the fire and the passing of the locomotive except that of sequence[63]

Demurrer to the evidence should be sustained where there is no evidence showing how the fire originated.[64] However, if the evidence tends to prove a probability that the fire was communicated by a locomotive, it is sufficient as against a demurrer to the evidence.[65]

b. Rebuttal of presumption of negligence

a. In General

Ordinarily, in actions for injury by fire alleged to have been caused by a railroad, the question whether the defendant has been negligent in the construction, equipment, or operation of its locomotive is a question of fact to be determined by the jury on a consideration of all the evidence in the case.

Ordinarily, in actions for injury by fire alleged to have been caused or originated by a railroad, the question whether defendant has been negligent in the construction, equipment, or operation of its locomotive is a question of fact to be determined by the jury on a consideration of all the evidence in the case;[74] and this rule is always applicable where the evidence bearing on the question is conflicting[75] or where different persons may form different conclusions from the evidence.[76] On the other hand, where there is nothing to justify an inference of negligence in the management, equipment, or operation of a locomotive, the question should not be submitted to the jury,[77] and a verdict should be directed for defendant,[78] but a motion by the railroad to direct a verdict should be denied where, although it showed freedom from negligence in the construction and condition of its locomotives, it introduced no evidence tending to show that the locomotive causing the injury was managed and operated in a skillful and approved manner.[79]

b. Rebuttal of Presumption of Negligence

Many decisions hold that where the defendant introduces evidence that its locomotive was properly equipped, in good repair, and carefully operated, the jury should determine whether the presumption of negligence which arises from proof that the fire was started by a locomotive has been rebutted; but some decisions hold that under such circumstances the presumption is overcome as a matter of law.

In determining whether the presumption of negligence which arises after proof that the fire was set out by a locomotive, discussed supra § 516 b (2), has been overcome by rebutting evidence, many decisions hold that, although defendant introduces evidence that the locomotive was equipped with proper appliances and was in good repair and carefully operated by competent employees, and although such evidence is not contradicted by evidence other than that creating the presumption of negligence, it is the duty of the court to submit to the jury the question whether this presumption is overcome by such rebutting evidence.[80] The reasons assigned are that proof of the communication of the fire to the property injured or destroyed by the locomotive establishes a prima facie case of negligence which must be regarded as a fact until contradictory evidence requires a different conclusion;[81] that such proof has the force of substantive evidence,[82] which, after proof of due care on the part of the railroad, gives rise to a conflict of evidence on the issue of negligence which is to be determined by the jury,[83] the prima facie case of negligence made by plaintiff standing on one side of the issue, and the direct evidence of defendant as to its care and diligence upon the other;[84] and that there is no theory on which a statement of defendant's witnesses must be accepted by a court as conclusive;[85] but the credibility of the witnesses and the weight to be given to their evidence[86] and the decision as to where the preponderance lies[87] are matters to be decided by the jury.

Some decisions have placed limitations on the foregoing rule and hold that it is for the jury to determine whether the presumption has been overcome by the rebutting evidence unless such evidence is so clear and circumstantial that no reasonable person could doubt its verity,[88] or so complete and irrefutable as to free the mind from all doubt and hesitation,[89] or unless such evidence is conclusive as to both the facts and the inferences reasonably to be drawn from them,[90] or is so conclusive that an opposite verdict might not be sustained.[91] The fact that there is no conflict in the testimony does not make the case one for the court instead of the jury where different conclusions may reasonably be drawn from the evidence or where its credibility is doubtful.[92]

On the other hand, other decisions have held that, where there is satisfactory evidence that the locomotive which caused the fire was properly equipped, in good order, and carefully managed by competent employees at the time of the fire, and there is no other evidence of negligence than that on which the prima facie presumption of negligence is based, the presumption is overcome as a matter of law and it is error to submit the question to the jury,[93] that on this showing the court should direct a verdict for defendant,[94] and that if the case is submitted to the jury and a verdict rendered in plaintiff's favor it should be set aside.[95] In support of this view, it has been said that the presumption under consideration is not a presumption of fact but a disputable presumption of law,[96] the office of which is merely to determine on whom the onus probandi is laid,[97] and that, where there is satisfactory evidence rebutting the pre-

Additional evidence of negligence. Where the presumption of negligence arising from the fact that plaintiff's property was set on fire by defendant's locomotive is strengthened by additional evidence of negligence, the question whether this presumption is overcome by rebutting evidence that the locomotive was equipped with proper appliances and was in good repair and carefully operated at the time of the fire is in all instances a question for the jury;[99] and it is erroneous to direct a verdict for defendant[1]

§ 532. —— Combustibles on Railroad Property

In an action for the destruction of, or injury to, property by a fire set out by a railroad, the question whether the company was negligent in permitting combustible matter to grow or accumulate on its right of way usually is one of fact which should be submitted to the jury.

In an action for the destruction of, or injury to, property by a fire set out by a railroad, the question whether the company was negligent in permitting combustible matter to grow or accumulate on its right of way usually is one of fact which should be submitted to the jury, who may or may not infer negligence from such conduct.[2] In determining whether the company was negligent in permitting combustibles to remain on its property, the jury may consider all the attending circumstances affecting the probability of fire[3] which might render the presence of such materials a cause of damage to others,[4] such as the extent to which combustibles had been permitted to accumulate on the right of way,[5] the season of the year,[6] the prevalence of a drought,[7] the velocity of the wind at the time of the fire,[8] and the fact that fire was communicated from a locomotive while laboring to ascend a heavy grade.[9]

§ 534. —— Proximate Cause of Injury

Ordinarily it is a question of fact for the jury to determine whether an injury caused by a fire started by a railroad, was the direct and natural consequence of the original negligence or firing or whether it was the direct result of another and independent cause

Ordinarily it is a question of fact for the jury to determine whether an injury caused by a fire started by a railroad was the direct and natural consequence of the original negligence or firing or whether it was the direct result of another and independent cause.[12]

In an action for injury from fire set out by a railroad, the instructions should correctly state the law applicable to the case, but in giving instructions the court should not invade the province of the jury.

In an action for injury from fire set out by a railroad, the instructions should correctly state the law applicable to the case,[13] and should not be contradictory,[14] indefinite,[15] argumentative,[16] abstract,[17] misleading,[18] or authorize a determination of questions from a mere conjecture or surmise on the part of the jury.[19] The instructions should properly inform the jury concerning the damage recoverable.[20]

An instruction should not assume the existence of facts which are in issue.[21] Accordingly it is erroneous for the court to invade the province of the jury by assuming that a certain specified state of facts exists, and instructing that they do or do not constitute negligence on the part of defendant[22] or contributory negligence on the part of plaintiff.[23] However, where the facts are shown by the evidence, and are so unequivocal as to allow no conclusion but that they do or do not constitute negligence, the court may so instruct.[24] It is not erroneous for the court to refer to the existence of certain facts if it leaves the question of their sufficiency to the jury.[25] Where the evidence is insufficient to establish a certain fact, proof of which is necessary to support a verdict, the court should take the case from the jury by peremptory instruction,[26] although it is not required to give such an instruction where the insufficiency of the evidence is on an immaterial matter.[27]

An instruction which selects one item of evidence, or one fact disclosed by the evidence, and states that a certain conclusion does not follow as a matter of law from that fact, is calculated to mislead and confuse a jury—M H Boals Planing Mills Co. v Cleveland, etc, R. Co, 211 Ill App 125

ly is sufficient in the absence of a request for further instructions in detail[28] It is proper to refuse a requested instruction on matters fully covered by instructions already given[29] or on immaterial matters,[30] but it is error to refuse a requested instruction on a material issue not covered by other instructions given.[31]

Construction. The instructions are to be construed as a whole, and the fact that one portion considered separately might be open to objection does not constitute error if the charge is correct in its entirety.[32] However, a correct instruction does not necessarily cure the error in another instruction unless as a whole the instructions state the law correctly.[33]

Degree of proof. General rules apply to instructions on degree of proof in actions for injuries by fires set out by railroads.[34] Instructions which place too low[35] or too high[36] a degree of proof on one of the parties are erroneous. It is erroneous to charge that plaintiff is entitled to recover if the evidence is evenly balanced on the question of defendant's negligence,[37] or that if a prima facie showing of negligence is made it can be overcome only by a preponderance of evidence showing that defendant was not negligent[38] It has also been held erroneous to charge that the burden of proof is on plaintiff to establish his right to recover by a preponderance of the evidence, but that it need not be shown beyond a reasonable doubt.[39]

§ 536. —— Applicability to Pleadings and Evidence

Instructions in actions for injury caused by fire set out by railroads must be in conformity with the issues and theories presented by the pleadings and the evidence.

Instructions in actions for injury caused by fire set out by railroads must be in conformity with the issues and theories presented by the pleadings[40] and the evidence.[41] An instruction is proper where it charges on issues which are supported by the evidence,[42] but an instruction is erroneous if given, or properly refused if asked, where it charges on issues or theories not raised by the pleadings[43] or the evidence.[44] A requested instruction which does not completely conform to the evidence may be modified by the court so as to conform to it.[45] On the other hand, instructions are equally erroneous which ignore material and competent evidence,[46] or which have a tendency to cause the jury to reject such evidence,[47] or which ignore or exclude from the consideration of the jury issues, theories, or defenses which are supported by the pleadings and evidence,[48] and such a requested instruction may be properly refused.[49]

railroad, the instructions on presumptions and burden of proof should not be misleading.[50] Incorrect instructions on presumptions are erroneous if given, and properly refused if requested.[51] An instruction which places the burden on plaintiff to establish the affirmative of such issues as are relied on by him, and which places the burden on defendant to establish the affirmative of such issues as are relied on by it, is not erroneous[52] Where a party who is entitled to a charge on the burden of proof requests such an instruction, the court errs in refusing it,[53] but instructions placing the burden of proof on the wrong party are properly refused,[54] and the giving of such instructions constitutes reversible error.[55]

Instructions on the origin of the fire should be confined to the issues raised by the pleadings and evidence.

Instructions on the origin of the fire should be confined to the issues raised by the pleadings and evidence,[56] and, where there is no evidence that the fire originated on the right of way of the railroad, the court is justified in so charging the jury.[57] The instruction should not invade the province of the jury,[58] be argumentative[59] or misleading,[60] or authorize a determination of the origin of a fire from speculation or conjecture on the part of the jury,[61] and should not direct the jury to find that the fire was set out by defendant's locomotive if the evidence fails satisfactorily to account for its origin in some other way.[62] However, instructions on the origin of the fire are not vitiated by the fact that one of the instructions considered separately might be open to objection, when the instructions construed as a whole are correct.[63] The instructions should properly state the degree of proof as to the cause of the fire, and an instruction which places either too high[64] or too low[65] a degree of proof on plaintiff is erroneous. An instruction which states that proof that a fire was set out by a locomotive may be circumstantial[66] or direct[67] is proper, and it is not erroneous to charge that it would be sufficient in law to fix the source of the fire on the railroad, if the evidence, in the opinion of the jury, makes a prima facie case that the fire originated from defendant's locomotive[68]

In an action for injury from fire set out by a railroad, an instruction which ignores the duty of the railroad company with respect to the construction, equipment, and operation of its locomotives in one or more particulars is erroneous; but the instruction should not charge on issues not raised by the pleadings or evidence.

In an action for injury from fire set out by a railroad, an instruction which ignores the duty of the railroad company with respect to the construction, equipment, and operation of its locomotives in one or more particulars is erroneous [69] The court should state correctly the degree of care required in the construction, equipment, and operation of locomotives,[70] and instructions which impose on the company too high[71] or too low[72] a degree of care are erroneous, and the giving of them constitutes a ground for reversal. The instructions should present the issues so as to guide the jury in their decision of the facts,[73] but instructions are erroneous when given, and properly refused when asked, where they charge on issues or theories not raised by the pleadings[74] or by the evidence.[75] Where the evidence is conflicting and will support an inference that the locomotive was improperly equipped and handled, the court is correct in refusing to charge that the evidence does not authorize a recovery [76] Where a recovery is sought on the ground that fire escaped from defendant's locomotive through negligence in the management of the train and failure to employ suitable means to prevent the escape of fire from a locomotive, it is error to refuse an instruction that a recovery cannot be had if the locomotive was of approved construction and was handled in a competent and skillful manner at the time of the fire.[77] Where negligence in the construction, equipment, or operation of the locomotive is essential to a recovery by plaintiff, the giving of an instruction that defendant will be liable merely because its locomotive set fire to the property in suit is erroneous[78] and the refusal of such an instruction is proper.[79] A charge which by reason of a clerical error affirms the nonliability of defendant, although the locomotive was defective, is erroneous.[80]

§ 540. —— Combustibles on Right of Way

In an action against a railroad company for injury from fire, where negligence with respect to combustibles on the right of way is an issue in the case, it should be submitted to the jury by appropriate instructions

In an action against a railroad company for injury from fire, where negligence with respect to combustibles on the right of way is an issue in the case, under the pleadings and evidence, it should be submitted to the jury by appropriate instructions,[81] and a refusal to give such instructions is reversible error.[82] On the other hand, where no charge of negligence in permitting combustible matter to accumulate on the right of way is made by the declaration or complaint, it is erroneous to give instructions on that issue.[83] If an instruction on the subject of negligence in leaving combustible material on the right of way is correct when taken as a whole, the fact that one part of it considered separately might be open to objection will not render the instruction erroneous [84] An instruction that defendant should use ordinary care to keep its right of way clear of combustible matter, but that the law does not require a railroad company to keep its right of way absolutely clean, is not objectionable as requiring the company to exercise ordinary care to keep its right of way absolutely clean,[85] but a charge that a company is not negligent if it exercised ordinary prudence in keeping its right of way in proper condition, without explaining the duty imposed on it as to its right of way and what was meant by proper condition, is misleading.[86]

In an action for injury from fire set out by a railroad, instructions on contributory negligence are properly refused where there is no evidence on which they can be based; but where such evidence does exist it is proper to instruct on the question of contributory negligence.

In an action for injury from fire set out by a railroad, instructions on contributory negligence are properly refused where there is no evidence on which they can be based.[87] Where there is evidence tending to show the absence of contributory negligence, the giving of an instruction which assumes that plaintiff is guilty of contributory negligence is erroneous,[88] and is properly refused.[89] It is proper to instruct on the question of contributory negligence where there is evidence tending to establish it;[90] and in such a case the giving of an instruction which entirely ignores the question of contributory negligence,[91] or the refusal of such an instruction when requested by defendant,[92] constitutes error. An instruction is not objectionable because it states that precautions were used by plaintiff, where there is undisputed evidence that plaintiff took some precautions against the risk of fire, and the instruction leaves the sufficiency of such precautions to the determination of the jury.[93]

Instructions given on the subject of contributory negligence should state correctly the law relating thereto,[94] and hence an instruction is erroneous which makes the wanton and intentional failure of plaintiff to use due care to put out the fire the test of his contributory negligence.[95] Instructions which require a verdict for defendant if plaintiff is guilty of contributory negligence without requiring the contributory negligence to be the proximate cause of the injury are erroneous,[96] and hence an instruction that plaintiff could not recover if he knew of the fire and made no attempt to put it out, without any reference to whether or not his efforts would have been unavailing, is erroneous.[97]

§ 542. —— Proximate Cause of Injury

In an action for injury alleged to have been caused by fire set out by a railroad, the court should charge the jury that the negligent act complained of must have been the proximate cause of the injury.

In an action for injury alleged to have been caused by fire set out by a railroad, the court should charge the jury that, in order to entitle plaintiff to recover, the negligent act complained of must have been the proximate cause of the injury.[98]

§ 543. Verdict and Findings

In an action for injury from fire set out by a railroad, special findings must be responsive to the issues made by the pleadings, be supported by the evidence, and find and state all facts essential to a recovery under the issues.

conclusions of law.[3] The findings must be consistent with each other, otherwise a judgment cannot be based thereon.[4] Where special findings are so inconsistent with the general verdict as to be wholly irreconcilable with it, the special findings are controlling;[5] but unless the conflict between them is irreconcilable it will not be sufficient to override the general verdict, and entitle defendant to a judgment on the special finding notwithstanding the verdict.[6] Special findings must be considered together, and if correct as a whole are sufficient, although some particular finding taken separately might be objectionable.[7]

Where trees, either growing or matured, are destroyed by fire as the result of the wrongful act of another, the owner may bring his action either for the value of the trees so destroyed[14] or for the injury to the real estate or his interest in it,[15] and the proper measure of damages in the former action is the market value of the trees destroyed independent of the real estate,[16] and the measure of damages in the latter action is the diminished value of the real estate.[17]

Statute imposing liability on railroad for all damages sustained by fire from operation of its road, being a special statute and in effect at time of enactment of the statute authorizing award of double damages against person or corporation starting or being responsible for fire which occasions damage to another, is not repealed by the later statute, and hence railroad is not liable in double damages for fire accidentally started by its locomotive which destroys or damages property of another—Missouri, K & T Ry Co. v Jackson, C A Okl, 174 F.2d 297.

Insurance. Generally, a railroad company which causes damages to another's property by fire is not entitled to a reduction of damages to the extent of insurance on the property paid by an insurance company to plaintiff,[18] and this rule has been held to apply under a statute imposing liability on the railroad company regardless of negligence.[19] Under some statutes, however, imposing absolute liability on the railroad regardless of negligence for injuries to property by fire, the liability of the railroad is limited to the excess of the damages suffered over the net amount of the insurance recovered by the property owner,[20] and, if the insurance is not recovered, the policy is assigned to the railroad, which may sue thereon.[21] Such a statute does not apply to a loss sustained before it became operative,[22] and such a statute must be construed, if possible, so as to harmonize with, and not be repugnant to, the standard policy provision entitling the insurer on payment of the loss to an assignment by the insured of his rights.[23] Where the railroad is held liable under such a statute, its right of action against the insurer becomes fixed, subject only to such ordinary defenses as would be open between the insured and the insurer.[24]

Attorney's fees. Some statutes authorize plaintiff to recover, in addition to damages, reasonable attorney's fees,[25] and the constitutionality of these statutes has been upheld.[26] Such a statute should be strictly construed[27] so not more than one attorney's fee may be allowed.[28] While it has been held that, in order to authorize an allowance of an attorney's fee, a demand for the fee must be made in the petition,[29] it has also been held that an attorney's fee may be granted even though there is no prayer for an attorney's fee in the complaint.[30] While it has been held error for the court to render judgment for an attorney's fee where no proof has been offered on that subject, and no agreement made as to what is a reasonable attorney's fee,[31] it has also been held that it is proper practice to file a motion asking that a reasonable attorney's fee be allowed after the jury has returned its verdict, and that, on hearing the motion, the court may fix the attorney's fee.[32]

XV. INJURIES TO ANIMALS

§ 547. Care Required and Liability in General

In the absence of statute the liability of railroad companies for injuries to animals is governed by common-law principles of negligence; such companies are ordinarily held bound to exercise ordinary care under the circumstances.

In the absence of statute the liability of railroad companies for injuries to animals depends on the common-law principles governing the liability of natural persons for their negligent acts under similar circumstances.[33] Although entitled to the exclusive and unobstructed use of their roads, as discussed supra § 100, railroads are subject to the general rule that every person must so use his own property as not unnecessarily to injure another;[34] but since the running of trains is in itself a lawful act, they are not liable for injuries resulting therefrom unless the right is exercised in an improper or unlawful manner,[35] and they will not, in the absence of statute, be liable for injuries to animals unless due to the negligence or misconduct of their employees.[36] In so far as liability for injuries to animals is in issue, these rules are equally applicable to a lumber company while operating railroad cars for its private use.[37]

Degree of care. With respect to injuries to animals, railroad companies are not held to the highest degree of care[38] or skill,[39] but only to the exercise of ordinary care.[40] On the other hand, it is not necessary in order to render them liable that there should be gross negligence or wanton or willful injury,[41] although, as discussed infra § 550, the rule is sometimes held to be otherwise in the case of trespassing animals. Accordingly, railroad companies are liable for injuries to animals resulting from failure to procure and use good and safe premises, machinery, and appliances,[42] employ competent servants,[43] or, in operating their trains, to exercise ordinary or reasonable care,[44] such as an ordinarily prudent man would use under the circumstances,[45] considering the dangerous character of the agency employed,[46] and having a proper regard both for the safety of the train and its passengers, and that of the animal,[47] the duty as to the train and passengers being paramount to that of avoiding injury to animals.[48]

Circumstances of the particular case must, as a general rule, determine what will constitute ordinary or reasonable care.[49] The care required in avoiding such injuries varies materially according to whether the animal was at the time of the injury rightfully or wrongfully on the track.[50] Where such duty is not imposed by statute, railroads are not liable for failure to provide places where stock wandering on the track might leave it if overtaken by trains;[51] or to keep a canal near the right of way, but on land of an adjoining proprietor, guarded,[52] or to keep their rights of way clear of obstructions so that animals can pass over and across the tracks freely;[53] or to keep the necessary ditches or excavations along the sides of its track free from accumulations of water or ice,[54] or at a public crossing to cover such ditches for the full width of the highway;[55] or to prevent stock from falling into ditches while driving them off the railroad right of way,[56] or to keep flagmen at crossings;[57] or to prevent stock from drinking oil escaping a tank car in a wrecked train.[58] On the other hand, it has been held that a railroad will be liable for injury to stock occasioned by its negligence in maintaining a barbed wire fence on or along its right of way in so defective or improper condition as to be a source of danger to stock,[59] or, having or being chargeable with knowledge that cattle were on the right of way and making no effort to keep them off, in spreading poison to kill the grass and weeds,[60] or, having knowledge that poison is escaping from one of its cars and collecting in a pool at a point accessible to domestic animals, in failing to exercise ordinary care to keep such animals away from the pool;[61] or, having knowledge of an uncovered well in a lot of land belonging to the railroad off its right of way, in failing to cover it;[62] or in burning plaintiff's pasture fence,[63] even when it had no notice of animals being within the inclosure.[64]

§ 548. —— Statutes Imposing Liability

Statutes imposing specific duties on railroads and increasing their common-law liabilities for injuries to animals provide a cumulative liability and do not restrict liability to the statutory grounds to the exclusion of liability for negligence generally.

The common-law duties and liabilities of railroad companies with respect to injuries to animals are not affected by statutes imposing liability on railroads in general terms for their negligent acts resulting in injuries to animals where the words used in the statute are construed to mean ordinary negligence.[65] In many jurisdictions, however, their common-law liability has been changed materially or added to by statutes, such as statutes requiring railroads to fence their tracks and construct cattle guards, as discussed infra §§ 558–581, to maintain a lookout for stock on the track, infra § 596, to maintain gates or bars at private or farm crossings, infra § 583, and to exercise certain precautions as to the giving of signals, infra § 595, and also by statutes regulating the speed of trains in certain localities, infra § 601. A statute requiring specific precautions to be taken by the railroad provides a cumulative liability with respect to injuries to animals and does not displace the common law in cases to which it applies,[66] nor does it restrict the railroad's liability to the statutory grounds to the exclusion of liability for other forms of negligence.[67] The company will be liable for injuries due to a failure to comply with the requirements of the statutes, although not otherwise negligent,[68] or if negligent, although the statutory requirements were complied with;[69] but the company cannot be held liable where there has been neither negligence nor misconduct on the part of its employees, nor a failure to comply with any duty imposed by statute.[70] A contract between a landowner and a railroad purporting to absolve the railroad from liability for the consequences of neglect of its statutory duty in the operation of its trains is against public policy, and is void.[71]

For failure to keep record of animals killed. Statutes requiring a railroad to keep a record of all animals killed, and providing that, for failure to make a record of an animal killed, the railroad shall be liable to the owner for twice the value thereof, do not impose liability for the killing of animals independently of negligence or nonperformance of some statutory duty related to the cause of such injuries.[72] In other jurisdictions the statutes impose a penalty absolute in its terms, and under these statutes, which have been held to be constitutional,[73] liability attaches for failure to record independently of whether or not the railroad is otherwise at fault,[74] and independently of the owner's knowledge of the killing.[75]

§ 549. —— What Law Governs

The liability of a railroad company for injuries to animals is governed by the law of the state in which the injury occurred.

The law of the state in which the injury occurred ordinarily governs the question of the railroad's liability;[76] and statutory provisions in the juris-

§ 550. —— Trespassing Animals

Some authorities hold a railroad liable for injuries to trespassing animals only where the injuries are willfully or wantonly inflicted; others hold it liable for such injuries only where they are brought about by gross negligence; still others hold the railroad liable for such injuries resulting from ordinary negligence.

Subject always to the paramount duty of the railroad to exercise the highest degree of care to secure the safety of passengers on its trains, as discussed supra § 547, there are three conflicting views as to the common-law liability of a railroad to owners of animals wrongfully on its track. The view held in a majority of the jurisdictions is that the railroad is liable for gross, wanton, or willful negligence only.[78] The second view holds the railroad liable only for injuries recklessly, wantonly, willfully, or intentionally inflicted, exempting it from injuries due to negligence, ordinary or gross,[79] and, since this is the rule at common law, it applies to cases not within the terms of a modifying statute,[80] but not to cases within the terms of such a statute.[81] The third view goes to the opposite extreme, holding the railroad liable for failure to use ordinary or reasonable care.[82]

It has been held that domestic animals, being irresponsible creatures, a railroad's liability for injuries to them when trespassing on the right of way is on the same footing as liability for injuries to trespassing children of tender years,[83] namely, that while the railroad is not liable for injuries resulting from the presence on the right of way of a dangerous condition known by the railroad to exist, where the railroad does not know and cannot be charged with notice of the presence of the animals on the right of way,[84] or where it cannot be held liable under the attractive nuisance doctrine,[85] it is liable where it maintains a dangerous condition knowing, or being chargeable with notice of, the probable presence of the animals.[86]

A railroad's duty to exercise ordinary care to prevent injuries to animals extends to dogs.

A railroad must exercise ordinary care to prevent injuries to dogs and will be liable for an injury due to negligence as well as where the injury was willful.[87] The engineer is under no duty to use care in discovering a dog trespassing on the track,[88] but the company will be liable if the injury could, by the exercise of ordinary care, have been avoided after discovery.[89] The railroad is not liable if the proper signals were given and due care was exer-

Poisoned grass

(1) Railroad was not liable for death of cattle killed by eating chemically sprayed grass on railroad company's fenced right of way, where spraying of grass did not result in maintenance of an attractive nuisance and there was no showing that railroad knew that cattle got through fence or left fence open.—Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Gillespie, 172 S.W.2d 1015, 26 Tenn. App. 390

(2) Failure of a railroad to notify an owner of fenced in cattle that it was going to place poison on its right of way was not actionable negligence, where cattle entered because a third person opened a gate.—Ft. Worth & R. G. Ry. Co. v. Brown, Tex. Civ. App., 173 S.W. 943.

85. Attractive nuisance doctrine inapplicable

(1) Tempting odors and flavor of vegetation which was on railroad right of way and which railroad had sprayed with poison deadly to animals did not render such right of way an "attractive nuisance," the maintenance of which would render railroad liable for death of trespassing animals eating such vegetation after breaking through an insufficient fence.—McKenzie v. Powell, 22 S.E.2d 735, 68 Ga. App. 285

(2) Where railroad company sprayed grass on right of way with a poisonous chemical so that grass turned white, owners of cattle killed by eating grass could not recover for death of cattle on theory that railroad was liable for maintaining "attractive nuisance."—Louisville & N. cised to avoid injury after the dog was discovered.[90] The application of statutes making proof of injury to an animal by a railroad prima facie evidence of negligence to dogs, geese, turkeys, etc, is discussed infra § 641, and the species of animals included, where liability arises from failure to fence, infra § 565.

Stock laws permitting stock to run at large generally have the effect of imposing liability on the railroad for ordinary negligence; stock laws prohibiting stock from running at large place such stock in the category of trespassing animals with respect to the railroad's liability.

It has been held that, where there is a municipal ordinance permitting stock to run at large, trains must be operated with reference to the right of the owner to do so and that the company must exercise at least ordinary care to avoid injuries;[91] and the same rule applies where the common-law rule which prohibits an owner from permitting his animals to run at large is not in force and there is no local stock law requiring animals to be restrained.[92] Where, however, the common-law rule as to stock running at large prevails, it has been held that the local regulations of a town or county cannot authorize a trespass on a railroad right of way[93] or impose any additional obligations on the company,[94] and that, although stock were at large pursuant to such a regulation, the company will not be liable in the absence of gross negligence or willful misconduct.[95]

Prohibiting animals from running at large. In localities where there are statutes or ordinances prohibiting stock from running at large, railroad companies have a right to presume that such animals will not be on the track,[96] even though the track is not fenced,[97] and are not required to exercise the same degree of care as in localities where it is lawful for stock to run at large.[98] As discussed infra § 566, however, such statutes or ordinances do not have the effect of releasing a railroad from its statutory obligation to maintain fences and cattle guards or from its liability under the statute if it fails to do so. Stock running at large in violation of prohibiting statutes or ordinances are trespassers,[99] and, under the majority rule as to liability of railroads for injuries to trespassing animals generally, discussed supra § 550, the railroad will not be liable except for gross negligence or injuries wantonly or willfully inflicted,[1] although the rule is otherwise in jurisdictions holding the view that a railroad must use ordinary or reasonable care with respect to trespassing animals on its tracks.[2] However, in jurisdictions where the statute provides that the degree of care must in all cases be ordinary and reasonable, it has been held that what constitutes this degree of care depends on the circumstances, including the application of stock laws in the particular locality, and that in such locations the requirement of reasonable care may be met, although less vigilance and watchfulness are used than would be required in others[3] The rule requiring ordinary care of a railroad engineer after he discovers a trespassing animal on the track, discussed infra § 606, applies to animals at large in violation of stock laws.[4]

An animal is not at large where it is shown that the injury was sustained in plaintiff's inclosure, used by him as a pasture, and through which the railroad has merely a right of way,[5] but where the animal was killed at a point where the railroad crosses a public highway along which the animal was roaming at will, the fact that the highway was on plaintiff's premises does not alter the fact that the animal was at large in violation of the stock law;[6] and an animal is at large within the meaning of the statute, even though it has escaped from a good inclosure without the fault of the owner.[7] A local law purporting to prohibit animals at large, which does not conform to statutory requirements, does not affect the liability of a railroad company for injuries to animals.[8] A statute providing that, where a bull is allowed to run at large, any person may castrate the animal after notice to the owner does not have the effect of prohibiting the animal to be at large so as to affect the liability of a railroad for injuries to such animal.[9]

§ 553. Frightening or Attracting Animals

A railroad company is not liable for injuries to animals resulting from their fright, unless the company was negligent in doing the thing which caused the fright or failed to exercise due care to avoid injury to the animals after discovering their fright; the company is liable for injuries proximately resulting from its negligence in the placing or maintaining of attractive substances on its tracks without taking due precautions to protect animals from passing trains.

A railroad company is not liable for injuries to animals due to fright caused by the noises necessarily incident to the operation of trains, such as the escape of smoke and steam and the use of whistles and bells as signals,[10] except where such noises were made negligently or wantonly,[11] in which case the company will be liable not only for injuries to the animals but also for injuries done by them in flight to other animals,[12] or, as discussed infra § 989, to persons and property.

So if the acts are not done in an unusual or improper manner the railroad company will not be liable for injuries caused by animals being frightened by noises merely because they were made unnecessarily,[13] or designedly to frighten animals away from the track and prevent their being injured by the train,[14] or by the crossing signals which it is the duty of the company to give,[15] especially at points where such signals are expressly required by statute,[16] and even at points expressly excepted from the statutory requirement, if the giving of the signal was proper under the particular circumstances.[17]

Where animals are frightened merely by the approach of trains, the company will not be liable in the absence of any negligence in the operation of the train or failure to exercise ordinary care to avoid the injury,[18] or in the case of proved negligence not shown to have been the proximate cause of the injury;[19] but it will be liable if the fright of the animal was due to the train being operated in a negligent manner,[20] or if after discovering the fright and danger of the animal the injury could, by the exercise of ordinary care, have been avoided.[21] There is no absolute obligation on the railroad in such cases to stop[22] or to use the greatest degree of care, ordinary care being all that is required.[23] If, after discovering the danger, the engineer did all that could be done reasonably to avoid the injury, the railroad is not liable.[24] It is also the duty of the railroad, in arranging its depot grounds,[25] and team tracks in its freight yards,[26] to take into consideration the liability of teams to be frightened by passing trains and to use reasonable care in guarding against this danger.

Attracting animals. It is negligence on the part of a railroad company to leave on its tracks anything, such as salt, hay, or grain, calculated to attract animals to the track, without taking reasonable precautions against any resulting injury to the animals from passing trains,[27] or if it fails to exercise ordinary care in discovering and thereafter removing within a reasonable time such substances if left on the track by persons not connected with the railroad company.[28] The existence of the attracting substance on the track constitutes a prima facie case of the railroad's negligence,[29] and the burden is on the railroad to show that it used reasonable care to avoid the injury.[30]

A railroad will not be liable, however, merely for leaving cars loaded with such substances for shipment standing on its tracks if they are not left for an unreasonable time,[31] or because it leases a portion of its right of way to be used for the purpose of a grain elevator,[32] or uses salt as a solvent for thawing out snow and ice from its switches,[33] or plants attractive vegetation on the roadbed, where the roadbed is on a dirt fill and the vegetation is intended to make the fill more secure,[34] or where animals are attracted to the track by salt or foodstuffs left exposed by third persons at buildings on the right of way which are not used by, or under the control of, the railroad company.[35]

§ 554. Place of Accident

Generally speaking, a railroad company is liable for injuries to animals resulting from its failure to use due care wherever they may occur; the care to be exercised at particular places must be commensurate with the danger reasonably to be apprehended.

A railroad company is liable for injuries to stock due to the negligence of its servants or agents wherever they may occur,[36] and the care to be exercised at particular places must be commensurate with the danger reasonably to be apprehended.[37] A railroad will be liable for injuries to animals due to a failure to keep its stations and grounds about them safe for the approach and use of persons doing business at such places,[38] but not for injuries to animals caused by the owner driving them over a portion of the grounds not designated for that purpose.[39] A railroad will be liable for injuries to animals caused by a failure to provide a safe and proper place for the delivery of freight,[40] or, where its tracks are laid in the streets of a town or city, for injuries due to negligence in the operation of its trains.[41] So, also, where a person stands a team at a place designated by its agent, for the purpose of transacting business with the railroad, the company will be liable for injury to the team by trains under its control;[42] but if the person had no right or authority to be at the place at the time of the injury and was there without the knowledge of the company, it owes him no duty to use due care unless and until the dangerous position of his team is discovered.[43]

§ 555. —— Accidents at Public Crossings

A railroad company is liable for injuries to animals occurring at public crossings resulting from the company's failure to use due care commensurate with the danger at such crossing.

In operating a railroad across a public highway the company must exercise ordinary care and diligence to prevent injury to animals rightfully on the highway,[44] and if the company by the mode of constructing its tracks or adjacent buildings unnecessarily makes a crossing particularly dangerous it must adopt corresponding precautions to prevent injuries.[45] It is not necessary to prove the railroad guilty of gross negligence to establish its liability, failure to use ordinary care under the circumstances being sufficient.[46] Where recovery is sought under a statute or charter restricting liability to particular crossings, liability is established only by bringing the case fully within the statutory terms and conditions.[47] Under a statute requiring a railroad to restore a highway to its former state after constructing the railroad, it is liable for injuries caused by its failure to do so,[48] but not liable for injuries caused by a ditch at a crossing not shown to be constructed or caused by the railroad in building its road.[49] In the absence of evidence of negligence or failure in the performance of statutory duties, the railroad is not liable [50]

Failure to maintain gates or flagman. If a railroad company is required by a city ordinance to construct gates at street crossings and keep them closed when trains are passing, a failure to do so is negligence which will render the company liable for any injuries to animals occasioned thereby,[51] but, in the absence of statute or an order made pursuant to statutory authority, a railroad is not liable for failure to maintain gates or a flagman at a crossing.[52]

Defective crossings. Where a railroad crosses a public highway, it is the duty of the company to make and maintain a good and sufficient crossing, so constructed that the public can cross with teams and vehicles with reasonable safety and convenience,[53] and in case of failure to do so it will be liable for injuries to animals due to defects in the crossing itself,[54] or injuries done by its trains at crossings owing to the improper construction or condition of the crossing,[55] and, where it is the duty of a railroad to maintain bridges that carry a highway over the track, it is liable for injuries caused by defects in a bridge,[56] regardless of whether or not it built the bridge [57] In the absence of a statutory requirement to repair, however, a railroad is not liable for injuries due to defects in a culvert at a point where one highway terminates in but does not cross another highway along which the railroad runs.[58]

Obstructions and standing cars. A railway company will be liable for injuries to animals due to its wrongfully obstructing the crossing of a public highway,[59] as by leaving its trains standing on a crossing for an unreasonable length of time;[60] but an obstruction of a highway crossing for a reasonable length of time incidental to the necessary operation of its trains does not make the railroad liable [61] Where cars are left standing near a crossing but not so as in any way to obstruct it, the company will not be liable for injury to an animal struck by a moving train in the absence of negligence in the operation of the train.[62] It is not necessary that the particular injury should have been foreseen in order to render the railroad liable for wrongfully obstructing a public highway, it being sufficient if it was reasonably to be expected that an injury might result.[63]

§ 556. Willful, Wanton, or Unauthorized Acts of Railroad Employees

Railroad companies may be held liable for injuries to animals caused by willful or wanton conduct of their employees if within the general scope of their employment.

Following the general rules as to liability of a master for injuries to third persons resulting from willful or malicious acts of his servant, discussed in Master and Servant § 572, railroad companies are liable for injuries to animals caused by the willful, wanton, or reckless conduct of their employees if within the general scope of their employment,[64] although the specific act is not authorized,[65] or is done at a time or in a manner contrary to an express order of the company;[66] but the company will not be liable where the servant was not engaged about the business of the company at the time of the injury but was on business of his own or another entirely disconnected from the service which he had engaged to render,[67] or where, although at the time of the injury the servant was engaged in the performance of the services which he had engaged to render, the act which occasioned the injury did not pertain to the duties of that employment.[68] The railroad is liable where an employee after hours, while on business of his own entirely disconnected from the service, does an act and in connection therewith omits to perform a duty owed to the railroad.[69]

§ 557. Persons Entitled to Damages

A person who is not the absolute owner of an injured animal may nevertheless have such a special property therein as to entitle him to damages.

A person, although not the absolute owner of an animal, may have a special property therein which will entitle him to damages for its injury by a railroad company,[70] notwithstanding a statute in terms gives the right of action to the owner;[71] and, in some states, recovery for injuries to stock is extended by the express terms of the statute to any person owning the stock in his own right or who has a "special ownership" therein.[72]

B. FENCES AND CATTLE GUARDS

§ 558. Liability as Dependent on Duty to Erect and Construct

The liability of a railroad company for injuries to animals frequently depends on whether, in the circumstances under which the accident occurred, the company was under a duty to have erected and maintained fences and cattle guards, and is discussed infra §§ 559–574.

Examine Pocket Parts for later cases.

§ 559. —— At Common Law

In the absence of a charter or statutory provision requiring it to construct and maintain fences and cattle guards, a railroad company is not liable for injuries to animals resulting from its mere failure to do so; but the failure to fence, even when not required by statute, may constitute negligence in a particular case.

Where not required by the terms of its charter or express statutory provision to construct and maintain fences and cattle guards, a failure to erect and maintain fences and cattle guards will not of itself render a railroad liable for injuries to animals.[73] However, even where railroads are not required by law to construct any fences, they must exercise ordinary care to avoid injury to animals which, while lawfully at large, may wander on the track;[74] and while the failure to fence is not necessarily a want of ordinary care,[75] it may constitute negligence in a particular case.[76] The railroad may at any time remove structures voluntarily constructed without incurring liability, independently of negligence, for injuries resulting therefrom.[77]

§ 560. —— When Required by Statute

Compliance with a fencing statute does not relieve a railroad company from liability for injuries resulting from negligence in the operation of its trains; noncompliance may subject the railroad company to liability under the terms of the statute regardless of negligence, and such noncompliance may also constitute negligence so as to support a recovery on the basis of common-law negligence.

Where a railroad constructs and maintains sufficient fences and cattle guards as required by law, it is not liable for injuries to animals in the absence of proof of negligence;[78] but the fact that fences and cattle guards are maintained does not relieve the company from liability on the ground of negligence in the operation of its trains,[79] although in some states the railroad company is not liable in the absence of gross negligence or intentionally inflicted injury[80] or unless the injury was wantonly or willfully inflicted.[81] Compliance with the fencing statute can in no way justify an injury wantonly inflicted.[82] Where a statute does not require the railroad to fence its line of tracks but relieves a company whose tracks are fenced of the burden, resting on a company whose tracks are unfenced, of proving its freedom from negligence, adequate fencing does not affect the liability of the railroad.[83]

Noncompliance with statute Where animals go on a railroad right of way by reason of the failure of the company to maintain fences or cattle guards as required by law, and are injured, the company is liable regardless of any question of negligence in the operation of its trains,[84] this being the rule where the statutes so provide,[85] and likewise where there is no express provision to that effect in the statute.[86] Liability in such case does not depend on a showing of negligence,[87] unless common-law negligence rather than the violation of a statutory duty is made the basis of the recovery sought.[88] Conversely, defendant cannot avoid liability by proof of the absence of negligence,[89] or proof that, with respect to the management of the train, the accident was unavoidable[90]

The same rule of absolute liability for injuries to animals due to failure properly to fence attaches under a statute which does not in express terms require the railroad to fence but which merely subjects the railroad to liability for injuries to stock on unfenced portions of its line,[91] although the rule is otherwise under a statute which merely provides that if the right of way is not adequately fenced the railroad company must prove its operatives free from negligence.[92] Moreover, the violation of the statutory duty to fence may be in itself an act of negligence sufficient to support a recovery at common law,[93] although it has been held that where a statute does not require a railroad to fence its right of way, but merely imposes liability for injuries in the absence thereof, the absence of a fence cannot of itself support a recovery on the Validity of statute

The development of transportation by motor carriers, since enactment of statute making railroads liable for stock killed by trains on unfenced right of way, has not rendered statute unconstitutional by depriving railroad of "equal protection of law" and "due process of law" because of discrimination between railroads and other carriers on which no such liability is imposed —Fort Worth & D C Ry. Designation of railroad's conduct as negligence

The railroad's liability grows out of its negligence in failing to reframe, in the absence of a sufficient fence, from killing or injuring plaintiff's livestock by locomotive or cars on any portion of the line which it is lawful to fence; but if the killing or injury occurs in any other way or on parts of the line which it is unlawful to fence, liability must be based on a showing of negligence generally — Payne v. ground of negligence.[94] Liability of the railroad cannot be grounded on its violation of a fencing statute held to be unconstitutional.[95]

Railroad corporations which are not within the terms of the fencing statute cannot be held liable thereunder.[96] Particular statutes have been held to impose liability on corporations operating lines within the state,[97] on railroads operated by mining and lumber companies,[98] and on railroads incorporated or constructed before the enactment of the fencing statute,[99] unless exempted therefrom by the terms of their charters[1] or by the terms of the general law.[2] However, a special charter in terms protecting it from interference which would detract from its profits does not constitute an exemption from the operation of the fencing statute.[3] Some statutes,[4] but not others,[5] have been held to impose liability for noncompliance with fencing requirements on railroads operated by electricity.

Places not required by statute to be fenced. Where animals go on a railroad track at places where the railroad company is not obliged to fence or construct cattle guards, within the rules discussed infra §§ 569–574, and are killed or injured, the case must be decided on common-law principles as if no statute on the subject of fencing existed,[6] and there can be no recovery against the railroad in the absence of proof that the injury was caused by its negligence,[7] as where the accident occurs on the station grounds,[8] or, as discussed infra § 573, at the crossing of a public highway. The degree of care required and consequent common-law liability vary according to whether the animal injured was rightfully or wrongfully on the track,[9] the company being liable for injuries due to a failure to exercise ordinary care and diligence,[10] unless the animal was unlawfully at large or a trespasser on the track, in which case, as discussed infra § 566, the company will be liable only for gross negligence or injuries wantonly or willfully inflicted

§ 561. —— Effect of Agreement or Waiver

A railroad company agreeing with an adjoining landowner to fence its tracks is liable for injuries to animals occasioned by its failure to carry out the agreement; an adjoining landowner who has agreed to construct fences or cattle guards or who has otherwise waived his rights to recover cannot maintain an action against the railroad company for injuries to animals due to the absence of fences or guards.

Where a railroad company in consideration of the grant of a right of way or other valuable consideration contracts with an adjoining landowner to fence its tracks, it is liable to such owner for injury to animals occasioned by its failure to construct or maintain such fences in accordance with the terms of its agreement.[11] Liability follows breach of the agreement regardless of the railroad's compliance with its statutory obligations to fence.[12]

Waiver or agreement of adjoining landowner. An adjoining owner cannot maintain an action against the railroad company for injuries to animals due to the absence of fences or cattle guards which he has agreed to construct and maintain or where he has otherwise waived his rights to recover,[13] and the railroad has not been negligent in its operations;[14] but a railroad company cannot by contract or agreement with an adjoining landowner with respect to the building of a fence by the latter relieve itself of liability for the killing or injuring of livestock resulting from the company's negligence, since such a contract is void[15]

Agreements releasing a railroad from liabilities to adjoining landowners for failure to fence are not binding on persons not parties to the contract or assenting thereto,[16] except under and to the extent of conditions imposed by statute;[17] nor are such agreements available as a defense to a second railroad not party or privy to the contract.[18] The waiver of one of several owners entitled to the statutory protection does not affect the rights of the other owners.[19] It is held by some authorities that a tenant is bound by his landlord's waiver or agreement,[20] although other authorities hold that a tenant, who has no notice and is not chargeable with notice of the waiver or agreement, is not bound thereby.[21]

A covenant in a deed of a right of way by which the landowner agrees to maintain the necessary fences runs with the land and estops all persons holding through or under him to maintain such actions to the same extent as the grantor himself;[22] but a personal agreement of the grantor does not run with the land or bind a subsequent owner;[23] nor does a conveyance of the right of way to the railroad with a release of its obligation to fence, but containing no covenant by the grantor to fence, affect the rights of a tenant of the grantor as against the railroad.[24] Covenants in a deed with respect to the maintenance of fences do not bind persons who are strangers thereto.[25] While an agreement between a railroad and a landowner does not affect the rights of third persons, a third person cannot recover where a lawful fence has been constructed and maintained by the landowner as he agreed to do,[26] and this is so regardless of whether the agreement was made before or after the enactment of the fencing statute.[27]

§ 562. —— Delegation of Duty to Third Persons

A railroad company ordinarily cannot avoid its liability resulting from failure to fence adequately by showing its agreement with a third person, imposing on the latter the duty to construct and maintain the fences.

A railroad company cannot avoid its liability for injuries to animals occasioned by the absence or defective condition of fences or cattle guards by showing that it had contracted with some third person to construct or maintain them and that the injury was due to a failure of such person to comply with his agreement,[28] unless, as discussed supra § 561, the owner of the injured animal is the same person who assumed the duty of maintaining the fences or is a party to, or otherwise bound by, his agreement.

§ 563. —— Prior Award of Damages or Compensation to Landowner

Under a statute to such effect, a railroad is relieved from liability for failure to fence as to owners who have been paid compensation for fencing; and in some jurisdictions, but not in others, this is the rule even in the absence of a statute specifically so providing.

Even in the absence of statute specifically so providing, it has been held that a railroad company is relieved from any liability for failing to maintain fences to a landowner who in the award of damages for the taking of his land is allowed compensation for this purpose,[29] especially where he received compensation therefor prior to the statute requiring railroads to fence,[30] although the road was not completed at the time of the enactment of the statute.[31] In other jurisdictions, however, it is held that a landowner who has been allowed compensation for building fences, but has failed to do so, may nevertheless recover for injuries to his stock.[32]

Under statutes in some jurisdictions, a railroad is relieved from liability for failure to fence as to owners who have been paid compensation for fencing,[33] but this statutory defense is not available to a railroad in an action grounded on its negligence independently of its liability for failure to fence.[34]

§ 564. —— Time for Construction

Where a statute expressly allows a certain time for construction of fences, a railroad company cannot ordinarily be held liable for injuries resulting from the absence of fences before the expiration of such time.

Where a statute expressly allows a certain time for construction of fences after the road is open for use or after the passage of the act creating the liability, it is necessary for plaintiff to show that this time had elapsed at the time of the injury complained of, if he bases his right to recover on the statute,[35] except in jurisdictions where the statute allowing a fixed term for construction is interpreted as merely providing an additional remedy, and as not taking away by repeal the rights of stock owners under other existing statutes to hold the railroad liable for failure to fence at any time without regard to the time when the road should be completed or put into operation.[36] Generally, however, if the statutory period has not elapsed, there can be no recovery unless actionable negligence in the operation of the train is shown;[37] nor will the fact that the railroad voluntarily constructed the fence and failed to keep it in repair before the lapse of the statutory period add to its obligation.[38] Where the statute provides that the time for construction shall be determined for each railroad by public authorities named therein after hearing, a railroad is not liable for failure to fence in the absence of the statutory determination.[39]

When statutory period begins to run. Under statutes requiring railroad companies to fence their tracks within a fixed period after the road is "open for use" without further qualification, the statutory period begins to run from the time when the railroad begins to operate its trains over it for construction purposes,[40] at the point where the animal entered.[41] The fact that the road is still under the control of the contractors does not change the liability of the railroad in that respect.[42]

The species of animals, for injuries to which railroad companies are liable where such injuries result from failure to fence, depend on the language and provisions of the particular fencing statute.

Statutes requiring railroad companies to maintain fences or rendering them liable for injuries to animals where no fences are maintained are designed for the protection of all domestic animals and will be liberally construed to this effect and not restricted to the particular animals mentioned,[43] nor will a statute making a railroad liable for injuries to "animals" killed or injured, without specifying the kind or size of such animals, be limited to those of such size as would endanger the safety of trains in case of a collision.[44] So a statute requiring railroads to maintain fences sufficient to exclude "cattle, horses, sheep, and hogs" will be construed to include asses[45] and mules;[46] the words "horses, cattle, mules or other animals" will be construed to include hogs;[47] and the term "stock" will be applied to any live stock, including hogs as well as cattle and horses,[48] but not dogs.[49] Under a statute making railroads liable for all animals killed or injured except where the road is "enclosed by a good and lawful fence," the company will be liable for injuries to all animals as to which a good and lawful fence would be any protection,[50] including hogs which such a fence would exclude,[51] but not for injuries to animals which a good and lawful fence as defined by the general fence laws would not exclude,[52] the burden, however, being on defendant to show that the animal injured was within the exception.[53] Under a statute requiring the construction of hog-tight fences, the railroad is liable for injuries to hogs escaping on to the track through an insufficient fence.[54]

Under statutes in other jurisdictions, the railroad is liable for injuries to "live stock running at large" if it does not fence,[55] and under these statutes, recovery has been allowed for injuries to a horse which had escaped from the control of the owner, although having on a halter and a bridle;[56] for injuries to a young colt which had wandered away from its mother, although the mother was under the owner's control,[57] for injuries to a steer which had strayed away from the rest of the herd and had been left behind without the herdsman's knowledge,[58] for injuries to a team of horses harnessed to a wagon which had broken away from where it had been hitched and escaped from the owner;[59] but not for injuries to a team of horses where the driver had fallen asleep from intoxication and the horses had wandered away from the road.[60]

§ 566. —— Trespassing Animals and Effect of Stock Laws

The fact that an animal was straying or trespassing when it was injured does not relieve a railroad company from liability for failure to fence as required by statute, nor does a stock law prohibiting the running of animals at large have such effect; but where a railroad is not required to fence, it is not liable for injuries to an animal at large in violation of a stock law in the absence of acts of negligence other than the failure to fence or, according to some authorities, in the absence of gross negligence or willfulness.

Provided the owner of the injured animal is entitled to the benefit of the fencing statute, under the rules discussed infra § 581, and provided the animal entered on the railroad right of way at a place where the statute applies, under the rules discussed infra §§ 569–574, the fact that the animal was straying or trespassing when it was injured does not release the railroad from its liability for failure to fence when the statute requires it.[61] Stock laws prohibiting the running at large of domestic animals do not relieve railroads from their statutory duty to maintain fences and cattle guards, or their liability for injuries due to their failure to do so,[62] although under the circumstances of some cases it has been held that, where stock is allowed to run at large in violation of law and the railroad has neglected its statutory duty to fence its tracks but is not guilty of any other negligence, plaintiff cannot recover.[63] However, where railroads are not required to fence and animals are unlawfully at large in violation of such laws, the company will not be liable except for gross negligence or injuries wantonly or willfully inflicted,[64] or, under a statute so stipulating, for negligence in the operation of its trains,[65] or where, although the animals are trespassers, the duty of the railroad company with respect to them is to exercise ordinary care;[66] but the rule is otherwise where the animals are not unlawfully at large in violation of such laws.[67] Where the statute does not require the railroad to fence but provides for its absolute liability for the killing of stock if it does not, and for its liability for negligent operation of its trains only, if it fences, a railroad which has not fenced is held absolutely liable for stock killed, even where the stock law prohibiting animals at large is in force.[68] Under statutes making a railroad liable if its road is not fenced "unless the injury complained of is occasioned by the willful act of the owner or his agent," it is held that recovery can be had, even though the animal was unlawfully at large when injured,[69] and even though the owner was guilty of negligence resulting in the animal's being at large,[70] and even though he permitted it to run at large in proximity to defendant's unfenced railroad track.[71]

§ 567. —— Place of Entry of Animal on Track

Ordinarily, it is the place of the animal's entry on the tracks rather than the place of the accident which fixes the railroad company's liability for failure to maintain adequate fences; the liability of the railroad for injuries to animals entering on its tracks from the highway or from lands on which they have been trespassing depends on the particular statutes involved.

In an action against a railroad company for injury to animals due to a failure to maintain fences, it is the place where the animal entered on the track and not the place of the accident which fixes the liability;[72] and, similarly, it is the fenced or unfenced condition at the place where the animal entered on the track that determines who has the burden of proof as to negligence, where the fencing statute affects only the burden of proof,[73] as discussed generally supra § 560 If the entry was at a place where there should have been a fence but there was not the company is liable,[74] although the accident occurred at a point where no fencing was required;[75] or where a sufficient fence was maintained;[76] while, on the other hand, the company is not liable if the animal entered at a place where there was a sufficient cattle guard,[77] or where the company was not required to fence,[78] although the accident occurred where the company should have maintained a fence but failed to do so,[79] unless the passage of the animal along the track from the place of entry, which was not a place required to be fenced, to the place of injury was due to the absence of a cattle guard at an intermediate place which it was the duty of the company to close with a cattle guard.[80] The fact that there were openings in the fence, made for the use and convenience of plaintiff which it was not the railroad's duty to keep closed, through which the animals might have gone on to the track, will not affect the liability of defendant railroad if the animals entered the right of way at some other opening which it was the railroad's duty to keep closed.[81]

Entry from highway. Where railroad companies are required by law to maintain fences and cattle guards, the company will be liable for injuries to animals which go on the track from a highway running parallel therewith, where no fence is maintained,[82] even though the railroad's right of way occupies a part of the public highway,[83] or for injuries to animals which enter at the intersection of a highway owing to the absence, or defective condition, of cattle guards[84] or end or wing fence connecting therewith[85] If a cattle guard sufficient to turn ordinary stock is maintained, the company is not liable for an injury to an animal which enters from a highway by jumping over such cattle guard.[86]

Under statutes requiring fences and cattle guards and providing that "until such fences and cattle guards shall be duly made, the corporation shall be liable for all damages which shall be done by their engines to animals" on their tracks, the company is liable without regard to whether at the time of entry the animals were rightfully or wrongfully on the highway;[87] but, under later statutes in some of these jurisdictions omitting this "absolute liability" clause, as it is called, with respect to cattle guards, but retaining it as to fences, it is held that there is no statutory liability on a railroad for injuries to a trespassing animal which entered from the highway over a cattle guard which was not sufficient to turn cattle.[88] In jurisdictions where the statute requiring railroads to build fences and cattle guards is construed as designed to protect only the owner or custodian of animals rightfully on the adjoining land or in the highway, as discussed infra § 581, it is held that if the animal injured was unlawfully at large and wrongfully on the highway at the time of entry, the company is not liable, although sufficient fences or cattle guards were not maintained,[89] unless, as at common law, the injury was wantonly, recklessly, or willfully inflicted.[90] Where the statute exempts the railroad from absolute liability if proper cattle guards are constructed, the railroad will not be liable for injuries to cattle coming on to the track over a properly constructed cattle guard unless the injury was willfully or recklessly inflicted.[91] In the absence of a statute requiring hog-proof cattle guards, the railroad is not liable for trespassing hogs getting on to the track at a public crossing, in the absence of willful or intentional injury.[92]

Entry from lands where trespassing. The liability of railroad companies for injuries to animals due to the absence of, or defects in, fences, where the animals are wrongfully on the premises from which they enter on the railroad track, depends on the application of the particular statute under which the action is brought, and particularly on whether such statutes are, under the rules discussed infra § 581, construed as being for the benefit of adjoining owners only or for the benefit of the public generally. Under statutes held to be only for the benefit of adjoining owners or those whose animals are rightfully on the premises from which they enter, the owner of an animal which enters on the right of way from lands where trespassing cannot recover from the railroad because of its failure to fence as required by statute,[93] unless the animals escaped to such premises through a defect in some other fence which it was the duty of the company to maintain.[94] In jurisdictions where the statutes are held to be in the nature of police regulations for the benefit of the public generally, the owner of an animal which enters on the right of way from adjoining lands may recover from the railroad on the ground of its failure to fence, regardless of whether the animal was rightfully or wrongfully on the land from which it entered.[95] Under the former rule, if the railroad company itself owns the adjoining lands it is not obliged to fence against itself, and will not be liable for injuries to animals which, while trespassing on its lands, go on the track,[96] but under the latter rule, the fact that the entry was from lands belonging to the railroad company is immaterial.[97]

§ 568. —— Place, Nature, and Cause of Injury

The liability of a railroad for failure to construct and maintain adequate fences is limited to injuries proximately resulting from such omission on the part of the railroad, and liability attaches only where the accident occurred at a place and in a manner contemplated by the statute.

In order to entitle plaintiff to recover under statutes making railroad companies liable for injuries to animals occasioned by a failure to construct or maintain fences or cattle guards, it must appear that the failure to do so caused or directly contributed to the injury complained of.[98] The company is not liable for all injuries which would not have occurred had the road been fenced but only such as are the proximate or direct and natural consequence of the failure to do so,[99] although the company will be liable if the failure to fence in connection with other acts of the company was the cause of the injury.[1]

The absence of a fence,[2] or wing fence,[3] or cattle guard[4] at the place of the injury is not the proximate cause of the injury if the animal did not enter there but came on the track at some other point where the road was properly fenced or was not required to be fenced, or through an open gate which it was the duty of the landowner to keep closed;[5] or if the animals were prevented from leaving the track by precipitous slopes on both sides;[6] or if a fence such as the company is required to construct would not have excluded the animal injured;[7] or if the fence if constructed would inevitably have been destroyed by a fire so recently before the accident that it could not have been restored in time to prevent the injury;[8] or if the railroad was not required to fence at the point where the animal came on to the track.[9]

On the other hand, a failure to fence is the proximate cause if the animal got on the track at the point where the railroad should have fenced, although injured at a point where no such breach of duty is shown to exist,[10] or after passing over a point in the track where there should have been a cattle guard and there was not.[11] A defective fence is not the proximate cause where the animal got on the track through an open gate;[12] nor is insufficiency of a gate[13] or the failure of the railroad to keep a gate closed[14] the proximate cause of the injury where the animal came on the track by reason of a third person leaving the gate open; but it is the proximate cause where the gate was left open by the company.[15] A defective latch is the proximate cause of the injury where the gate was opened and closed without lifting it by a person who relied on its being caught and kept closed by the latch.[16] Where two railroads run parallel, and neither is properly fenced, and stock passes over one to the other and is there injured, the proximate cause of the injury is the failure to fence on the part of the company on whose track the stock is injured, and the company on whose track it first entered will not be liable.[17]

Injury not on right of way. Ordinarily the injury to the animal, for which recovery under the fencing statute is sought, must have happened on defendant's right of way;[18] and no liability rests on a railroad for injuries to livestock which entered the right of way through a defective fence and left the railroad's right of way through another defective fence and was injured elsewhere by an instrumentality other than the railroad's operations.[19]

Nature and cause of injury generally. A statute requiring railroads to maintain fences on the rights of way, and imposing liability, where such requirement is not complied with, for damages to livestock by "agents, engines or trains," cannot be applied so as to impose liability for damages due to causes other than the railroad's mechanical or other agents.[20]

Where collision with train necessary. Collision with the train has been held essential under statutes providing that the railroad shall be liable on failure to fence for animals killed or injured by the engines or cars of the railroad,[21] or by its agents, engines, or cars,[22] or by its agents, employees, engineers, or cars,[23] or killed or injured by any train, engine, or cars,[24] or if its engines or cars shall kill or maim any domestic animals,[25] or under a section of a statute providing that a railroad shall be liable for all damages to stock from failure to fence where the title of the act restricts it to stock injured by railway trains.[26]

Under these statutes, there can be no recovery where animals on the right of way are frightened by approaching trains and are injured in jumping from the track,[27] or by running on bridges or trestles,[28] or against wire fences,[29] or in an attempt to jump a cattle guard;[30] or go on the right of way and are injured by falling into a cut, pit, or well,[31] or eating poison grass,[32] or drinking cottonseed oil escaping from a wrecked car;[33] or are injured by the employees of the railroad in extricating them from a bridge or trestle.[34] These statutes are construed so strictly as to exclude recovery for an animal not struck by the train, even though tied to another animal which was struck.[35] Nevertheless, even in these jurisdictions a recovery may be had for injuries to an animal resulting from a cause other than collision with a train, where it is sought not on the ground of the railroad's statutory liability but on the ground of the railroad's negligence in failing to perform its statutory duty to fence,[36] and the restrictive words in the statute are held not to apply to recovery for injuries caused by the willful or wanton acts of the railroad's employees.[37]

Where collision with train unnecessary. Collision with the train has been held not to be essential under statutes imposing liability for stock injured when the injury results from want of a fence;[38] or for animals killed or wounded "by the engine or cars . . . or in any other manner whatever in operating such railway,"[39] or for animals killed or injured by negligence, "and a failure to build and maintain . . . fences as above provided shall be deemed an act of negligence on the part of such companies;"[40] or "for reasonable damages for any injury—whenever such killing or injury is caused by any moving train or engine or cars upon such track,"[41] or "for any and all damages which shall be done by the agents, engines or trains to any cattle" on defendant's road;[42] or where a statute imposing liability for damages done by agents and engines is supplemented by other legislation making it mandatory on railroads to build fences.[43]

In these jurisdictions, even in the absence of collision with a train, the company is liable whenever the injury is the natural and proximate result of its neglect of its duty with respect to fencing,[44] and the injury is due to the want of a fence, within the meaning of this rule, whenever the want of a fence in connection with the acts of defendant is the proximate cause of the injury.[45] A recovery is allowed under these statutes where animals on the right of way are injured by being frightened by approaching trains and running on bridges or trestles,[46] or into wire fences,[47] or are injured by the negligence of the servants of the company in extricating them when caught in bridges or trestles.[48]

Where fences are constructed the company will be liable for injuries to animals not caused by the operation of its trains but by the fence itself owing to its dangerous or defective structure or condition.[49] Where the statute in express terms specifies the causes of injury for which recovery is allowed, recovery may be had for injuries resulting from the causes named[50] provided the losses are the proximate consequence of the railroad's default.[51]

§ 569. Particular Places Where Fence or Cattle Guard Required or Not Required

Generally speaking, a railroad company is not liable for injuries to animals resulting from the absence of a fence or cattle guard at the place of injury, where the statute does not require the company to maintain a fence or cattle guard at such place; whether or not a fence or cattle guard is required at a particular place depends on the language and construction of the statutes

Except as and to the extent that the circumstances may create a common-law liability, as discussed in general terms supra § 559, the rules of liability for injuries to animals arising from failure to erect a fence or construct cattle guards do not apply where the statute does not require any fence to be built or cattle guard to be constructed at the particular place where the animal entered on the right of way.[52] In the absence of express exceptions as to places where fences or cattle guards are required, in determining whether a particular place is an exception the statutes will be given a reasonable construction according to their object and intention,[53] and an exception will be implied wherever the maintenance of a fence or cattle guard would be unreasonable or improper,[54] would be unlawful,[55] would interfere with the necessities and convenience of the public in travel or in transacting business with the railroad,[56] would unreasonably interfere with the railroad in the proper use of its own property or in transacting its business with the public,[57] would endanger the lives of its employees engaged in switching or operating its trains,[58] or would entrap straying animals and put them in the way of passing trains without possibility of escape.[59]

The interest and convenience of the public, however, and not that of the railroad company[60] or of a private business enterprise,[61] is the controlling consideration; and an exception based on interference with the business of the railroad can be sustained only on the ground that it promotes the public good by conserving the ability of the railroad to discharge its duties to the public.[62] In order that a place may be within the meaning of the exception, express or implied, it must be shown to be such by the use made of it rather than by the name given to it,[63] and by a continued, regular use at that point as distinguished from an occasional use depending on the convenience of the railroad,[64] and, if the issue is raised, it must be shown not to be the result of a condition wrongfully or unlawfully created by the railroad's act.[65]

General rules as applied to fences. In applying the general rule as to nonliability for injuries at places where fences or cattle guards are not required, it has been held that a railroad is not required to fence such places as are expressly excepted from the operation of the statute.[66] Where, however, railroads are required by law to fence their roads, it is not the province or policy of the courts to create exceptions to the rule,[67] and they will not do so except in view of some paramount public interest or paramount duty on the part of the company which would render the maintenance of fences improper,[68] and in the absence of such considerations if the company has a right to fence and fails to do so it will be liable for any injury to animals occasioned thereby.[69]

A railroad will not be relieved from fencing merely on the ground that it would be inconvenient to the company,[70] or that the construction of a fence would be difficult[71] or expensive,[72] or, if built in the only possible place, would exclude part of the railroad right of way.[73] The fact that its charter provides that a railroad shall maintain fences at certain places does not prevent the application of a general statute requiring fencing at all places where the road can be fenced.[74] Under some statutes making a distinction between places where a railroad is required to fence and places where it may fence if no inconvenience to the operation of the road or public access thereto is involved, the liability for failure to fence at one of these places differs from liability for failure to fence at the other: liability for failure to fence at one of these places cannot be established by proof of liability for failure to fence at the other.[75]

Where a railroad crosses a watercourse, it is sufficient if the fences are constructed upon either side up to, and connected with, the bridge, trestle, or culvert, so as to prevent animals from going upon the track, and it is not necessary to fence across the stream so as to prevent their escape under the track from an adjoining inclosure.[76]

General rules as applied to cattle guards. In applying the general rule as to the nonliability for injuries to animals at places where fences or cattle guards are not required, it has been held that a railroad is not required to maintain cattle guards where to do so would interfere with the public interest and convenience[77] or would endanger the lives of its employees,[78] or at points not proved to be within the statutory description of places requiring them.[79] However, the fact that the railroad is not required by statute to fence does not by implication relieve it from an obligation to construct cattle guards where the statute in express terms requires them.[80]

The fact that animals entered the right of way at a place where it could not fence or construct cattle guards does not relieve it from liability for failure to construct cattle guards at intermediate points between the place of entry and the place of collision,[81] especially where it is shown that the animals strayed along the track for a long distance and beyond other places where a cattle guard would have turned them off the track.[82] Under the statutes generally, cattle guards must be placed at the limits of places where the duty of fencing begins, to prevent animals from passing from unfenced places upon the tracks beyond.[83]

§ 570. —— Cities, Towns, and Villages

A railroad is not liable for injuries to animals resulting from the absence of a fence or cattle guard in a city, village, or town, or a particular place therein, where it is not required or permitted to maintain a fence or cattle guard at such place.

Under statutes requiring railroads to fence but expressly excepting "within the limits of towns, cities and villages," there can be no recovery for injuries to animals based solely on the failure to fence, where the failure to fence relied on is within the limits of a town, city, or village.[84] A "town" in these statutes means a collection of houses larger than a village and smaller than a city, having no reference to territory incorporated as a town under the township organization laws.[85] A "village" is a small group of houses for dwellings or business, or both, in the country, regardless of whether or not they are situated upon regularly laid out streets and alleys.[86]

Except in particular situations, railroads are not relieved from liability for failure to fence merely because the road is within the limits of a city, town, or village, where such places are not excepted from the operation of the fencing statute; and this is the rule where the statute makes it obligatory on railroads to build fences in terms broad enough to include cities, towns, and villages,[87] and where there is no statute compelling railroads to construct fences, but where there is a statute placing liability for injuries to animals on them if they do not.[88] In jurisdictions having two statutes in force, one making it obligatory on the railroad to fence where it passes along cultivated fields or uninclosed prairie lands, sometimes called the "double-damage act," the other relieving the owner of an injured animal from proving the railroad's negligence in cases where it might have lawfully fenced but did not, sometimes called the "single-damage act," it has been held that the latter statute is applicable to cases where the animals are injured in cities, towns, and villages, unless at street crossings where the railroad could not lawfully fence,[89] but the same kind of an action could not be maintained under the statute making it obligatory to fence where the injuries were inflicted in cities, towns, and villages to which that statute does not apply,[90] although it may be maintained under the fencing statute if the road where the injuries were inflicted is located along the edge of a town and neither the streets nor limits of the town extend beyond it,[91] or in the territory of a formerly existing town which has ceased functioning as a town, so that it is no longer even a corporation de facto, the statute applying to such places.[92]

Places within corporate limits. Where the statute requires the railroad to fence in cities, towns, and villages, it must fence within such limits at all places where the maintenance of a fence would not be unlawful or an unreasonable or improper interference with the operation of the road or the necessities and convenience of the public.[93] It has been held that railroads need not fence in portions of towns, or cities platted into blocks or lots where their tracks are intersected and crossed by streets and alleys,[94] especially where the statute expressly declares that no railroad need be fenced "when not necessary to prevent horses, cattle, sheep, and hogs from going upon its track from adjoining land," and the platted portion of the city falls within this exception.[95]

The fact that the town is not incorporated is immaterial if it is regularly laid out and the track is crossed by streets and alleys.[96] It has been held, however, that, where the road runs along or across vacant lots, the railroad company must fence between the streets,[97] and it is uniformly held that they must fence at places within the city, town, or village limits where there are no intersecting streets and alleys,[98] or at places which are used for agricultural purposes,[99] or are located on the outskirts of the town where the land is open and not occupied with buildings.[1]

Streets and crossings. A railroad company is not permitted to fence its tracks at the crossing of a street,[2] and this rule applies although the street has not been opened to public travel[3] or is not in a condition to be used except by persons on foot.[4] Neither is a railroad permitted to fence its tracks where they run along instead of across a street, and are subject to the public easement;[5] but the rights of the public extend no further than the street, and the fact that streets or alleys abut on and terminate at a railroad track is no objection to fencing.[6] The rule requiring the construction of cattle guards at public crossings applies to street crossings[7] except where the crossing is within an open space, such as the depot grounds, which is not required to be fenced,[8] or where the track runs along one street which is crossed by other streets so that cattle guards would form an obstruction to travel.[9] An objection that numerous cattle guards would weaken the roadbed and thus increase the damage is not available in the absence of proof that such would be the case.[10]

§ 571. —— Stations, Switchyards, and Depot Grounds

A railroad company is not liable for injuries resulting from failure to maintain fences at or about stations, switchyards, and depot grounds, where it is not permitted or required to maintain a fence at such places.

A railroad company is not liable for failure to fence such grounds at its depots or stations as the necessities or convenience of the public and the proper conduct of the business or the road at such places require to be left open and unobstructed;[11] and this is the rule equally where expressed in the statute[12] or implied from the necessities of the case.[13] With respect to its liability for failure to construct and maintain fences at station grounds, the company is not obliged to build a fence between the station grounds and the land of an adjoining owner, where the fence would obstruct access of the public to the depot grounds,[14] but it may be required to do so where the fence does not in any manner interfere with the use of the station by the public or could not in any wise inconvenience the railroad in the operation of its trains or endanger its employees in the discharge of their duties,[15] unless it would not serve to inclose any part of the railroad between the station grounds and the land of the adjoining owner.[16]

Character of place and business transacted. In considering the exemption from the duty to fence which exists with respect to stations and depots, it is immaterial whether there is a depot or station agent at the place,[17] how many passengers or how much freight is actually received or delivered there,[18] or whether the station is located within or without the corporate limits of a city, town, or village;[19] and hence the exception to the fencing statute has been held to apply to a mere flag station,[20] notwithstanding the railroad did not have a building or keep an agent at such station.[21]

The exemption from the duty of fencing at depots and station grounds applies also to approaches to such grounds which could not be fenced without inconvenience to the public;[22] to switches, sidings, and platforms where freight or passengers are received and discharged;[23] to grounds necessary for access by the public and convenience of shipment about an adjacent mill,[24] hay press,[25] storage house or grain elevator;[26] to lots used for storing, loading, and unloading lumber;[27] and to grounds in the immediate vicinity of the company's engine house or machine shops,[28] or its coal or wood yards,[29] or tracks where cars are stored and inspected.[30] The exception also applies to such switches and switch limits as the public convenience and proper handling of trains require to be left unfenced,[31] but no further than is necessary for such purposes.[32]

Ordinarily it is held that no fence need be constructed within the switch limits where to make the fence effective would also require the construction of cattle guards which would endanger the lives of the company's employees,[33] but a fence which would be effective without the cattle guard must be constructed and maintained even though the cattle guard is itself impracticable.[34] Where a switch is crossed by a public road so that the entire switch cannot be fenced, and the construction of wing fences and cattle guards would endanger the lives of employees, the company need not fence any part of the switch.[35]

The exception has been held not to apply to a place formerly used as depot grounds but since abandoned,[36] or to a "flag station" so called, at which little or no business was done;[37] or to a passing track outside station grounds;[38] or to a point where passengers are permitted to get on and off, and at which freight is sometimes thrown off, but from which and to which no tickets are sold;[39] or to a siding used merely for the loading of ties, wood, and piling purchased by the company, the amount of business done at the siding not appearing;[40] or to a sidetrack used for loading a single commodity and only occasionally used and not located at a station or depot;[41] or to stockyards with necessary sidetracks and switches which the railroad used only for its own accommodation;[42] or to a switch maintained only for the accommodation of a mill, mine, or quarry,[43] or used for storing cars and maintained only for the convenience of the railroad,[44] or to a switch where the public use and transaction of business are not shown.[45]

Extent and limits of grounds. It is not necessary that a railroad company should make any formal separation or dedication of its station grounds or put up notices as to their limits,[46] nor, on the other hand, can the company, by purchasing or appropriating any particular amount of ground, acquire the right to leave unfenced any more than may be necessary for the purposes of the public and the business there transacted.[47] The exemption from the duty of fencing extends to whatever limits the public necessities and convenience and the proper conduct of the business there transacted require,[48] taking into consideration the reasonably anticipated growth of business at that point,[49] but this necessity is also the limit of the exception,[50] and is not affected by the mere convenience of the company,[51] nor is it conclusively determined by its arbitrary judgment as to the needs of the company and the public at that point,[52] although fencing near a station will be taken as an admission that the place is outside the yard limits.[53] So if a greater amount of ground than necessary is left unfenced and animals are injured thereon, the company will be liable,[54] notwithstanding such grounds were in fact used by the company.[55]

Cattle guards. The same principle that excuses a railroad company from fencing at stations and depot grounds applies to the maintenance of cattle guards.[56] So it is not necessary to construct cattle guards where a street or highway crosses the track within such grounds,[57] where they would inconvenience the public in reaching the station or transacting business with the railroad,[58] or where they would endanger the lives of the company's employees engaged in switching, coupling, or operating its trains,[59] unless the company has created the necessity for a cattle guard at a particular place by failing to fence at some other place where it should have done so, in which case it is bound to construct the cattle guard at the risk of endangering its employees.[60]

The company must, however, maintain cattle guards where the station grounds end and the duty of fencing begins,[61] and along its side tracks or switches where the considerations of safety and public convenience do not apply,[62] mere inconvenience to the company being insufficient to excuse the omission.[63] It has been held, however, under a statute making it obligatory to construct cattle guards at all crossings, that proximity of the crossing to a station of defendant, and the inconvenience to the public if a cattle guard should be placed there, will not relieve the railroad of its obligation under the statute.[64]

§ 572. —— Improved, Inclosed, Unimproved, and Uninclosed Lands

The extent to which the railroad company's liability is affected by whether the land through which the road passes at the place of injury is improved, unimproved, inclosed, or uninclosed depends largely on the language of the statute.

Under statutes merely requiring in general terms that railroad companies must fence their tracks, it has been held that they must fence along their tracks where the road passes through inclosed as well as uninclosed land.[65] The obligation to fence railroads passing through inclosed lands rests on them where the statute in terms so stipulates, as, for example, under statutes expressly requiring railroads to fence where the road passes through "enclosed or improved land,"[66] "inclosed or cultivated fields or inclosed lands,"[67] "lands owned and settled or occupied by private owners,"[68] "lands owned and improved by private owners,"[69] "private property or enclosed land in the actual possession of another,"[70] or through, along, or adjoining "inclosed or cultivated fields, or uninclosed prairie lands."[71] "Improved" land, within the meaning of these statutes, is occupied land, even though it is not cultivated,[72] as, for example, an uncultivated village lot appurtenant to a dwelling house and barn[73] or land used partly as a mill yard and which is also mowed and occasionally used for grazing,[74] but it does not include uninclosed commons.[75]

Under a statute requiring railroads to fence where the road passes through private property or inclosed land, it is not necessary that the private property should be fenced by the owner in order to make it the duty of the railroad to fence.[76] "Inclosed or cultivated fields, or uninclosed prairie lands," used in some statutes, applies to timber lands if inclosed as well as other inclosed lands,[77] to land uninclosed which is also prairie land,[78] but not to uninclosed land which is not prairie land.[79] Uninclosed timber land from which the timber has been cleared off is not prairie land within the application of the statute.[80]

Under these statutes, the fact that an adjoining owner fails to fence up to his line does not affect the duty of the railroad to fence its road where it

Union Pac. R. Co., supra.

"Passes through"

Phrase "passes through" as used in statute requiring railroad to fence right of way where it passes through privately owned and improved lands may mean more than dividing lands privately owned so that the same owner will have lands on both sides of the right of way, and may apply where railroad is laid out along the dividing line between two owners or where it takes a strip of privately owned land along one side and where the other side of the right of way abuts on publicly owned lands, but it does not apply where railroad right of way goes alongside of but not through or over lands which are or have been privately owned.—Wilde v. passes through uninclosed prairie land,[81] and a statute requiring fencing of railroads "adjoining" inclosed or cultivated lands requires fencing where the road runs through or along such lands.[82] Lands, in order to be "inclosed," need not be inclosed by lawful fences.[83] Under a statute requiring the erection of cattle guards where a railroad "enters or leaves any improved or fenced land," a railroad constructed across unimproved and uninclosed lands, which are afterward improved and inclosed, must, after such change in the character of the land, be provided with cattle guards where the road enters and leaves such land.[84]

Land inclosed on three sides. Under some of the statutes it is only where the adjoining lands have been inclosed on the other three sides that the railroad is required to complete the inclosure by fencing along its right of way[85] In some of the states, this rule applies to unimproved land.[86] Where this rule prevails, an owner of the injured animals who has done nothing toward inclosing his lands, or given the statutory notice to the railroad of his intention to do so, cannot recover under the statute for the railroad's failure to fence.[87]

Unless required to do so by statute, the failure of a railroad company to maintain a fence where its road crosses a public highway does not subject it to liability for injuries to animals resulting from the absence of such fence; but a railroad company ordinarily will be liable for injuries resulting from the absence of adequate cattle guards at public highway crossings.

A railroad company is not required or permitted, and hence is not liable for failure, to fence its road where it crosses a public highway,[88] or to construct gates or other obstructions at such crossings to prevent animals from going upon the crossing.[89] However, a railroad, while it may not be required to fence, must construct and maintain suitable cattle guards and wing fences at public highway crossings,[90] and these must be located at the point of intersection and as near as practicable to the highway,[91] and if located unnecessarily distant from the highway the company will be liable for animals injured while in the intervening space.[92] Nevertheless, if an animal goes upon the track at the crossing and is injured upon the crossing itself, the absence of cattle guards cannot affect the case and will not render the company liable.[93] In order to avoid pockets or traps at oblique crossings where the railroad and the highway form an acute angle, lateral fences must be continued beyond the point of intersection between the highway and the boundary line of the right of way over a part of the highway to the point where the highway intersects the tracks, and a cattle guard put in at that point, and a railroad failing to do this is liable for injuries to animals caught in the trap[94]

Character and establishment. The rule that railroad companies are not liable for injuries resulting from failure to fence their roads at public crossings applies to highways de facto as well as to highways de jure,[95] but not to alleged highways which have no existence at all,[96] especially where the railroad now relying on its existence had previously denied it.[97] With respect to the railroad company's liability for injuries occurring there, if a crossing is used and traveled by the public generally as a highway the company need not fence at the crossing, although it is not a regularly laid out and established highway,[98] and not worked or improved by the county,[99] or the route traveled is outside the survey or line of the highway as established by the county authorities;[1] nor, on the other hand, need the railroad maintain fences where the road crosses a strip of land which has been legally dedicated to the public as a highway, although it has not been reduced to actual use by the public.[2]

"Private roads" which by statute are free to be traveled by all persons as public roads and are so termed by the statute merely to distinguish them from public roads which are maintained at public expense need not be fenced by railroads where they intersect the railroad.[3] Wherever the crossing is such that it is not required to be fenced, the company must construct cattle guards to prevent animals from passing from the intersecting highway on either side along the tracks,[4] and whenever a crossing is abandoned and ceases to be a public highway the company must then construct fences at that point,[5] but nonuser for a period of time not amounting to abandonment will not have this effect.[6]

Highways parallel with railroad. In the absence of statutory requirement, a railroad, in order to avoid liability for injuries occurring there, is under no obligation to fence between its tracks and a highway parallel with and in close proximity thereto,[7] and failure to do so does not constitute negligence.[8] Where, however, the railroad company is required to fence in such situations, the fact that its right of way runs parallel with and adjoins a public highway does not exempt the company from its statutory duty and corresponding liability,[9] and the fact that the right of way overlaps the highway does not affect this duty and liability if there is sufficient room for constructing a fence upon the right of way between the highway and the tracks,[10] and in such case, where the railroad permits the public to use part of its right of way as a public road, it is under duty to fence between such road and its tracks[11]

So also, if the track occupies a part of the public highway by permission of the highway authorities, the railroad must fence between its tracks and the remainder of the highway which is used by the public[12] The railroad, however, is not obliged to fence if the location of the railroad with respect to the highway is such that a fence cannot be constructed without obstructing the highway[13] unless the use of the highway as such has been abandoned by the public[14]

§ 574. —— Other Places

The liability of a railroad company for injuries to animals resulting from the absence of fences or cattle guards at various particular places has been judicially determined by the courts.

It has been held that a railroad company which fails to fence its tracks as required by law is liable for stock killed upon the road, although a good and sufficient fence is maintained by the adjoining landowner;[15] but, on the contrary, it has been held that it is immaterial who constructs the fences as long as they are sufficient,[16] and that if an adjoining owner voluntarily constructs and maintains such a fence the company is not liable because it did not construct another fence along the same line[17] Even under the latter view, however, it is the duty of the company to see that the fence is kept in repair and to restore it if removed by the owner,[18] and the company will be liable in the absence of any evidence as to the character and sufficiency of the fences maintained by the adjoining owners.[19]

Fences on both sides of track Ordinarily where railroads are required to be fenced they must be fenced on both sides of the track,[20] even under a statute requiring fencing where the road passes along or adjoins lands of a certain description and the railroad adjoins land of the character mentioned only on one side.[21] However, if from the character or use of the adjoining premises on one side the company is not required to fence on that side, it has been held by some authorities that it need not fence on the opposite side;[22] but other authorities have held that it must.[23] A statute requiring railroads to fence "either or both" sides of their property does not contemplate that the matter shall be optional with the railroad company but means either or both sides as the circumstances may demand;[24] and under such statute, where it is for the benefit of adjoining landowners only, the railroad need fence only on the side next to the private owner where the land on the other side is unoccupied and unclaimed public land.[25]

Adjoining lands of defendant railroad. Where fencing statutes are regarded as police measures, under the rules discussed infra § 581, a railroad company owning land adjoining its road must fence between its own land and the track[26] unless a partition fence along the exterior line of the adjoining land completely incloses the track.[27] On the other hand, where the statute is construed as being for the benefit of adjoining owners only, a railroad owning adjoining land is not required to fence between its own land and the track.[28]

Adjoining lands or tracks of other railroads. Where two railroads run parallel with each other, neither can rely on the duty of the other but each must see that its own road is properly fenced;[29] and, where no fence is constructed between the tracks, the company upon whose road an animal is injured cannot avoid liability on the ground that the animal got upon its road by crossing the unfenced tracks of the other road,[30] although there is also authority to the contrary.[31] Where, however, the rights of way and tracks of two railroads adjoin and run parallel to each other, a fence between the rights of way is unnecessary if private property on either side of the combined rights of way is properly protected by a railroad fence.[32] In jurisdictions in which a railroad must fence between its track and a parallel railroad, the company over whose tracks the animal first entered will not be liable for the injury occurring upon the other road.[33] The fact that the tracks are too close together to permit the construction of a fence between them without endangering the safety of passengers or railroad employees does not relieve the railroad of its statutory liability.[34] Where two railroads intersect, and one of the companies neglects to maintain proper lateral fences, the other company must construct cattle guards and wing fences at the crossing;[35] but this is not necessary where both railroads perform their statutory duties.[36]

§ 575. Sufficiency, Defects, and Repairs

The sufficiency of fences and cattle guards as affecting the liability of the railroad company for injuries to animals is discussed infra § 576; and the extent to which such liability is affected by defects and repairs infra §§ 577–580.

§ 576. —— Sufficiency

Generally speaking, railroad fences and cattle guards are sufficient if they are reasonably adequate to prevent animals of ordinary habits and disposition from going on the track or where they substantially conform to statutory requirements.

Generally speaking, railroad fences are held to conform to legal requirements if they are reasonably sufficient to prevent animals of ordinary habits and disposition from going upon the track.[37] It is not necessary that they should be built to meet extraordinary conditions[38] or that they should constitute an impassable barrier to all stock without regard to how breachy or vicious they may be.[39] If, however, the fence is not reasonably sufficient to keep out stock,[40] sufficiency having reference to the strength as well as to the height of the fence,[41] to be determined by an examination of the fence itself and not by the previous conduct of animals which have been pastured on ground which it in part incloses,[42] or if it is constructed in such a negligent or improper manner as to constitute a nuisance or source of danger,[43] the company will be liable for animals injured in consequence thereof. A deviation in the course of the fence from the line of the railroad right of way,[44] and the inclusion of gates,[45] will not subject the railroad to liability if fence and gates are otherwise sufficient and acquiesced in by the adjoining owner

Statutes. A statute requiring construction of fences suitable and sufficient to prevent cattle, horses, sheep, and hogs from getting upon the railroad sets up a practical standard which is not met if the fact of cattle, horses, sheep, or hogs getting through the fence and on to the track is the natural consequence of existing conditions[46] A statute requiring the construction of "legal and sufficient" fences is construed as requiring fences along an adjoining inclosure reasonably sufficient to keep out the kind of domestic animals kept in that particular inclosure.[47]

Where a prior statute established standards of sufficiency, a later statute requiring railroad companies to make and maintain a good and sufficient fence, but not itself prescribing any standard or test of sufficiency, has been held to adopt the standards established by the prior statute.[48] Under a statute compelling railroads which have not built fences to do so, and prescribing the height and character of the fence to be built, and providing that railroads which have built fences shall conform to these specifications whenever they rebuild or repair, it has been held that the obligation to conform to the later specifications is not imposed on a railroad on making slight repairs of a fence already built, but only when the repairs are substantial, amounting practically to a rebuilding of a portion of a fence[49]

Conformity to division fences. A statute requiring a railroad to construct "suitable" fences, without referring to any standard, does not require that they should conform to division fences.[50] This is especially so where the railroad fencing statute sets up a standard of its own,[51] as, for example, a fence suitable and sufficient to prevent cattle, horses, sheep, and hogs from getting upon the railroad,[52] or where it provides in express terms that no law of the state with respect to the fences of farmers or landowners shall be applicable to railroad fences unless specifically so stated in the regulation[53] It has been held, however, that a statute requiring construction of a "lawful" fence does refer to the standard set up in the statute on inclosures.[54] A statute prescribing that railroad fences shall be of the height and strength of division fences, but nowhere fixing what that height shall be, either by its own terms or the provisions of the division fence statute, has been construed as requiring fences of sufficient height and strength to prevent cattle and other animals from getting on the railroad.[55]

Wire fences. A wire fence properly constructed[56] and complying substantially with statutory requirements[57] is sufficient; but, although sufficient to turn stock, the fence must not be of such a character as of itself to be a source of danger,[58] and a barbed wire fence may or may not be a proper fence according to the character and use of the lands inclosed[59]

A statute prohibiting the use of barbed wire has been held not to apply to fences already existing;[60] and buckthorn wire, consisting of flat iron twisted ribbons with teeth, has been held not to be a barbed wire fence within the prohibition of the statute[61]

Natural barriers. A steep bluff, hedge, ditch, wall, or the like may constitute a lawful fence if of equal security with a lawful fence as defined by statute,[62] but such natural obstructions must be sufficient to serve the purposes of a fence,[63] and when they cease to afford that measure of security a fence of posts and boards or wire must be constructed.[64] Natural barriers serving as fences must be properly connected with the railroad fences where they begin and terminate.[65]

Cattle guards and wing fences. Where railroad corporations are required to construct cattle guards, a railroad will be liable for injuries to animals due to a failure to construct cattle guards reasonably sufficient to exclude ordinary stock[66] or to maintain them in a proper state of repair,[67] or where they are located in the wrong place,[68] or are used as a substitute for the statutory fence,[69] or are so constructed as to be a trap or snare for stock;[70] or where the adjacent fences do not extend up so as to prevent the passage of stock between the fence and the cattle guards;[71] or where a section of the cattle guard is missing, admitting cattle through the unguarded space on to the track.[72] However, cattle guards, in order to be sufficient, need not be so constructed as to constitute an impassable barrier so that under no circumstances could an animal cross them,[73] or so as to turn hogs unless the statutory conditions precedent to the requirements of hog-proof cattle guards are complied with,[74] or so as to turn stock which is wild, breachy, or in the habit of fence jumping,[75] or stock when under fright or excitement,[76] but need only be such as are reasonably sufficient to turn ordinary stock[77]

In the absence of any statutory plan or specification for cattle guards, they should be constructed in such manner as an ordinarily prudent man would construct them with a view to prevent injury to his stock and at the same time to prevent the depredations of stock upon his inclosure.[78] The mere fact that an animal goes upon the track by jumping over such a cattle guard and is injured does not render the company liable in the absence of negligence,[79] nor is the fact that an animal passed or jumped over a cattle guard of itself evidence of its improper construction or insufficiency.[80] If, however, there is other evidence as to the character or insufficiency of the cattle guard, the jury may consider this fact in connection with such other evidence.[81] The mere fact that an animal is injured by the dangerous character of a cattle guard such as is in ordinary use does not subject the railroad company to liability, since such danger is a necessary attribute of a cattle guard.[82] to turn cattle from the road, it requires by implication the wing fences necessary for the sufficiency of the guard,[83] a fence across the road with gates is not a proper substitute therefor;[84] and under such statute a cattle guard in general use by first-class railroads does not meet the requirements if it is not reasonably sufficient to turn cattle from the road.[85] A statute requiring approval of cattle guards by commissioners does not require approval of each cattle guard constructed, but merely an approval of the type of construction.[86]

Waiver and estoppel. With respect to the railroad company's liability for injuries to animals, the insufficiency of a fence may be waived by an adjoining owner, when the fencing statute is construed as being for his benefit only.[87] Where a statute prescribes that railroad fences shall be of the height and strength of division fences, but nowhere fixes what that height shall be either by its own terms or the provisions of the division fence statute, a railroad building and maintaining over a long period of years a fence of a particular height cannot afterward be heard to say, in the absence of evidence of local regulation or local custom, that a lower fence would be sufficient.[88]

§ 577. —— Defects and Repairs in General

Where a railroad company is required by law to construct fences and cattle guards it is liable for injuries to animals resulting from failure to keep the fences and cattle guards which have been constructed in good repair if, according to most authorities, such failure is attributable to a lack of due care on the part of the railroad.

Generally speaking, with respect to the liability of a railroad company for injuries to animals, the consequences of its failure to fence its right of way attach to its failure to keep its fences in good repair.[89] So, where the fencing statute imposes no liability for failure of a railroad company to have its right of way adequately fenced, but merely places on the company the burden of proving its freedom from negligence, the company is not liable for injuries to animals entering the right of way through a defective fence, in the absence of negligence on the part its employees;[90] and a mere failure to keep cattle guards in good order does not constitute such negligence.[91]

Where a railroad is required by law to construct fences and cattle guards, it will be held liable for injuries to animal occasioned by its failure to repair them[92] or to replace them when destroyed,[93] and this rule applies regardless of how or by whom the fence was originally built,[94] as in the case of fences already constructed by adjoining owners and adopted by the railroad company,[95] and notwithstanding the adjoining owner has been accustomed voluntarily to keep the fences in repair,[96] but, under statutes in some states, slight repairs, if they can be made without considerable labor or expense, are for the adjoining owner to make.[97]

The railroad's liability for failure to repair is unaffected by the fact that the accident happened in the winter season when cattle are not accustomed to run at large and when openings in the fence are left for convenience in hauling wood to the railroad;[98] or by the fact that the fence had been torn down with intent to rebuild, and that the railroad had notified the landowner of its intent to do so;[99] or by the fact that the abutting landowner had relocated and reconstructed the fence with the consent of the railroad,[1] or by the fact that the railroad waived the statutory notice from the landlord to build, and voluntarily constructed the fence in advance of the time when under the statute it was required to build,[2] or by the fact that the adjoining owner joined his fences to the railroad fence, thereby making use of it to inclose his land and still did not contribute anything to keep the railroad fence in repair, in the absence of contract or statute obligating him to do so,[3] or by the fact that the railroad constructed the fence entirely on the land of the adjoining owner;[4] or by the fact that the railroad had made an agreement with an adjoining owner not to maintain the fence, when the benefit of the fencing statute is not restricted to adjoining owners and plaintiff was some person other than the contracting landowner.[5]

The liability of the railroad to repair has reference to the fence nearest the railroad track, where the railroad maintains two parallel fences on the same side of its road.[6] As discussed supra § 559, independently of statute, a railroad is liable for injuries to animals caused by its negligent act, and in at least one jurisdiction the statutes have been construed to give the owner of injured animals a remedy under the statute against the railroad for failure to repair fences, but only a remedy at common law for injuries due to defective cattle guards.[7] In jurisdictions having in force a statute compelling railroads to fence for violation of which double damages are recoverable and a statute fixing liability for compensatory damages for injuries to animals caused by failure to fence, recovery of compensatory damages for injuries caused by a defective cattle guard may be had, even though an action for double damages will not lie, the injuries not being caused by collision with a train.[8] A railroad company may be relieved of its liability to repair by an agreement placing the obligation on the landowner, where the fencing statute excepts such contracts from its operation.[9]

Voluntary erection or construction by railroad. Where there is no law requiring railroads to fence, it has been held in some jurisdictions that they will not, in the absence of circumstances creating a common-law liability, be liable for failing to repair fences[10] or cattle guards[11] which they may have voluntarily constructed, and that, if there is a gap in such fence through which animals enter, no greater degree of care is required to avoid injury to such animals than would otherwise be necessary to avoid liability;[12] but in other jurisdictions it has been held that if the railroad voluntarily constructs fences or cattle guards it is liable if it fails to keep them in a proper state of repair,[13] as, for example, where it constructs fences in station grounds,[14] and in such jurisdictions there must be evidence of construction and maintenance of the fence by the railroad in order to subject it to liability for failure to repair.[15]

Care required and extent of liability. While there is some authority to the contrary,[16] the general rule is that, where fences such as the law requires have been constructed, railroads are only bound to use reasonable care and diligence in maintaining them and in discovering and repairing defects subsequently occurring,[17] the liability for failure to repair being different in this respect from the liability for failure to erect;[18] and they are not absolute insurers of the fences which they are required to build[19] or absolutely liable for injuries to animals occasioned by defects occurring therein,[20] and the rule has been applied even where a statute provides that the company shall be liable for injuries to stock "when [the fences are] not in good repair."[21] The term "ordinary care" or "reasonable care" is to be applied in view of the extra hazard and the public duty involved,[22] and means a higher degree of care than an ordinarily careful landowner would be expected to exercise in keeping up his own fences.[23] The rule obligates the railroad to use proper care to guard against animals coming on to the track while the fence is temporarily down during reconstruction or repairs.[24]

The frequency with which fences should be inspected depends on the circumstances bearing on the probability of the fences being thrown down or destroyed, and the consequences which might naturally ensue.[25] It is not necessary that a patrol should at all times be maintained along the road to see the condition of the fences.[26]

§ 578. —— Knowledge of Defect and Opportunity to Repair

Except in jurisdictions where there is absolute liability for failure to repair, the railroad company is entitled to a reasonable time to discover a defect in a fence or cattle guard and to make the necessary repairs before liability attaches.

Although where, under the statute, a railroad company is absolutely liable for failure to repair regardless of whether or not it exercised due care in discovering defects, as discussed supra § 577, the question of the railroad's knowledge of the defect does not arise,[27] the general rule is that, where fences such as the law requires have been constructed, the railroad company will not be liable for injuries to animals due to defects subsequently occurring therein unless it had either actual or constructive notice of the defect and an opportunity to repair it.[28]

The company is entitled to a reasonable time to discover the defect[29] and to make the necessary repairs.[30] The notice of the defect, however, may be either actual or constructive,[31] and the company will be liable where it is requested by the landowner to make repairs,[32] or where by the exercise of reasonable care and diligence it could have known of the defect,[33] or if the defect has existed for such a length of time prior to the accident that it ought to have been discovered.[34] If the special defect which caused the injury was due to a generally defective condition of the fence which had existed for a considerable length of time, the company will be liable, although without notice of the special defect.[35] If the fence as originally constructed was defective it is not necessary to show any knowledge on the part of the company of the defect in order to render the company liable.[36]

If the necessary repairs are not made within a reasonable time after notice of the defect,[37] or after the company should, by the exercise of reasonable care and diligence, have known of it,[38] the company is liable. In computing the reasonable time, Sunday must be counted as a day on which repairs may be made if trains are run on that day.[39]

§ 579. —— Defects Caused by Third Persons

A railroad company ordinarily is not liable for injuries to animals resulting from a defect in a fence or cattle guard caused by the act of a third person, in the absence of negligence on the company's part in failing to discover and repair the defect within a reasonable time.

Where a railroad company has constructed sufficient fences, and animals are injured by reason of a breach therein, made by persons not in the employ or under the control of the company and without its knowledge or authority, the company will not be liable in the absence of any negligence in failing to discover and repair the defect within a reasonable time;[40] but, although the defect was so caused, the company will be liable if it is not repaired within a reasonable time,[41] or, where the fence is being repeatedly broken down by third persons, to the knowledge of the railroad, if the railroad does not take steps to prevent it.[42] If the person leaving the opening in the fence did so under direction of agents of the railroad, duly authorized, the railroad is liable.[43]

As discussed infra § 587, under the statutes in some jurisdictions, railroads are expressly relieved of liability for gates left open by adjoining owners or by trespassers.

§ 580. —— Defects Caused by Fire, Wind, or Storms

Generally speaking, a railroad is not liable for injuries to animals resulting from defects in a fence caused by fire or windstorm in the absence of negligence in failing to discover and repair such defects within a reasonable time; its liability for injuries resulting from snow and ice on a fence or cattle guard depends on whether it has been negligent in failing to remove such accumulations within a reasonable time.

Where a proper fence is constructed, a railroad company will not be liable if not negligent in discovering and repairing the defect for injuries due to defects therein caused by fire[44] or windstorm;[45] but it will be liable if the defect is not repaired within a reasonable time[46] unless it was the duty of the adjoining landowner to repair it.[47] Railroad companies are not required to build their fences so high that the fall or drift of snow will never cover them;[48] nor are they required to remove the snow and drifts from their fences so as to prevent animals passing over them,[49] although it has also been held that they must use reasonable diligence in doing so, if they own the land on both sides of the fence.[50]

Cattle guards. It is held in some jurisdictions that railroad companies must exercise reasonable care and diligence to keep their cattle guards free from accumulations of ice and snow which would render them ineffective,[51] and that they will be liable for injuries to animals due to a failure to remove such accumulations within a reasonable time,[52] but if it uses due diligence, and animals are injured before the snow can be cleared away, the railroad is not liable.[53] Liability for failure to clear cattle guards of snow is grounded on negligence,[54] which, as discussed infra § 673, is usually a question of fact for the jury, depending on circumstances of location of the road, position and condition of the cattle guard, prevailing storms, weather conditions, and other relevant facts. However, because of the severity of the winters, it has been held that, except under exceptional and extraordinary circumstances, reasonable care and diligence do not require a railroad company to remove the natural accumulations of snow and ice from its cattle guards[55]

§ 581. Persons Entitled to Benefits of Statute

With respect to the liability of a railroad company for injuries to animals resulting from failure to comply with the provisions of fencing statutes, some statutes are construed as being only for the benefit of adjoining landowners while others are held to be in the nature of police regulations for the benefit of the general public.

The statutes requiring railroad companies to maintain fences and cattle guards are in some jurisdictions construed as being only for the benefit of adjoining landowners.[56] These statutes include within their protection occupiers, tenants, or lessees of such landowners,[57] and animals rightfully upon such lands with the express or implied consent of the landowner;[58] and if the owner of the land has entered into an agreement with the railroad, under the terms of which one who pastures cattle on the adjoining land with the owner's permission has no rights as against the railroad, the licensee and owner of the injured animal cannot by assignment of his right of action to the owner recover in the latter's name.[59] In these jurisdictions plaintiff must show, in order to entitle himself to the benefit of the statute, his title or interest in, or right to occupancy of, the adjoining land [60]

General public. In another group of states, the statutes are held to be in the nature of police regulations for the benefit of the public generally,[61] although particular statutes even in these jurisdictions may restrict the protection to a particular class.[62] Also, it has been held, under such a statute that a railroad, being under no obligation to the public to fence off its own land from the track, is not liable to a tenant occupying land of the railroad adjoining the track for injuries to his animals due to a failure to fence between its own land and the track [63]

In Missouri the statute requiring railroad companies to fence their tracks where they pass through unınclosed lands or along a highway has been held to operate for the benefit of the general public and not for adjoining owners only,[64] and, while the provisions requiring fencing where the road passes through inclosed or cultivated fields has been held to be only for the benefit of adjoining owners[65] and tenants,[66] this construction of the statute has been expressly limited and modified,[67] and it is now well settled that the requirement inures to the benefit of any person whose animals are on the adjoining premises by permission or with the consent of the landowner[68] or which stray upon the adjoining lands if such lands are not inclosed by a lawful fence;[69] but, if such lands are inclosed by a lawful fence on all sides except next to the railroad track, that is all the protection which persons other than the landowner are entitled to;[70] and if the animals of third persons break over such lawful fences and go over the track and are injured there can be no recovery although the railroad company failed to fence along the track.[71]

C. PRIVATE CROSSINGS, GATES, AND BARS

Where a landowner's premises are divided by a railroad right of way, and there is no ordinary passway, he has a right to cross the railroad with his animals, but the right must be reasonably exercised, and he cannot pasture the animals or allow them to stray or loiter on the right of way; and if he crosses the track at a place other than at a crossing the railroad company is required to maintain, he must take it as he finds it.

Where a landowner's premises are divided by a railroad right of way and there is no highway or ordinary passway to enable him to get from one portion to the other, he has a right to cross the railroad with his animals,[72] but he has no right to a private crossing from a road parallel to the right of way to a private lane closed by a gate and having no outlet.[73] His right to cross must be reasonably exercised.[74] He cannot pasture the animals, or allow them to stray or loiter on the right of way.[75] Where a person who is a mere licensee crosses a railroad track at a place other than such crossings as the railroad company is required to maintain, he must take it as he finds it and cannot recover for injuries to his animals due to the condition at that place.[76]

Where gates have already been constructed at a private crossing in compliance with statutory requirement, it cannot be held negligence on the part of the railroad company to continue them merely because a way under a trestle at that point rendered a way over the tracks unnecessary.[77]

and farm crossings must be fenced or otherwise adequately protected

The exemption from the duty of fencing at the crossing of public highways which is discussed supra § 573 does not apply to private ways and farm crossings,[78] and such places, in the absence of statutory exception, must be fenced or otherwise adequately protected.[79] Where, however, there are statutes prohibiting the obstruction of private ways, fences, gates, or bars cannot be constructed across them.[80] Under a fencing statute, general in its terms, which makes no express reference to private crossings, it has been said that the company may determine whether this protection shall consist of gates or other structures provided the protection afforded is reasonable;[81] but under similar statutes other authorities have held that cattle guards are not sufficient and that the obligation, absolute except as to public crossings and station grounds, is to "fence," using gates or bars as part of the fence.[82] Where the statute provides for private crossings but does not expressly require gates or bars, it has been held that such a requirement is implied from the necessities of the situation,[83] but only to the extent that it is necessary for the use, convenience, and safety of the public.[84] Under statutes expressly requiring gates or bars at private crossings, failure to erect and maintain such gates or bars subjects the railroad to liability for injuries to animals coming on to the track at the unprotected crossing,[85] although it has been held that cattle guards may be substituted therefor where gates or bars would seriously interfere with the use of a particular crossing,[86] and such substitution may be made at certain private crossings more important than farm crossings.[87] The railroad is not relieved of this duty and liability by the fact that the deed to it of the right of way from the owner of the land through which the way passes binds it to maintain fences but says nothing as to gates.[88]

§ 584. Sufficiency, Defects, and Repairs

Gates or bars at private or farm crossings constitute a part of the fence, and must be sufficient to serve the purpose of such a fence as the railroad company is required to construct and maintain.

As affecting the duties and liabilities of railroad companies with respect to fencing, the gates or bars at private or farm crossings constitute a part of the fence,[89] and must be sufficient to serve the purposes of such a fence as they are required to construct and maintain.[90]

Mode of construction, if not prescribed by statute, is not material, provided it is sufficient to turn ordinary stock.[91] If the mode of construction is prescribed by statute, but is not itself designed to turn small animals passing under it, the fact that the fence as constructed did not conform to the statutory requirements will not subject the railroad to liability for injuring such animals.[92] The gates must be provided with suitable and sufficient fastenings to keep them securely closed,[93] reasonably, not absolutely, proof against opening by stock,[94] particular kinds of fastening being used if specified in the statute.[95] Bars must not only be of sufficient strength but so arranged as not easily to be displaced or thrown down by stock.[96] A gate is not necessarily improperly constructed because hung so as to open toward the right of way,[97] or constructed as a sliding gate instead of being hung on hinges,[98] or because the hook or fastening is on the inside, next to the pasture or land inclosed,[99] although this fact may have a bearing on whether or not the gate was negligently constructed.[1] The fastening is not sufficient, however, if the gate will open by mere pressure against it,[2] nor is a sliding gate sufficient if it is too short to close the opening.[3]

§ 585. —— Maintenance and Repair in General

It is the duty of a railroad company to keep a private crossing constructed by itself in a safe and proper state of repair, but it is not liable for injuries due to defects in a crossing constructed and maintained by third persons, although it must exercise reasonable care to keep private crossings clear of obstructions dangerous to animals.

It is the duty of a railroad company to keep a private crossing constructed by itself in a safe and proper state of repair,[4] but it is not liable for injuries due to defects in a crossing constructed and maintained by third persons,[5] even though the railroad knows of the crossing and permits its use,[6] or in an opening under a railroad bridge built by the railroad for its own use only, but privately used by plaintiff as licensee for the passage of stock.[7] The railroad must exercise reasonable care and diligence to keep private crossings clear of obstructions dangerous to animals,[8] and the gates or bars in repair;[9] but it is not an insurer of owners of animals against their getting through the gates.[10]

The duty to use reasonable care in the maintenance of gates exists whether the duty of constructing them is imposed on the company by statute or agreement[11] or whether it has constructed them voluntarily,[12] and, where the statute imposes a duty to construct and maintain gates at farm crossings, the duty exists if the farm crossing exists, independently of the question whether a duty is laid on the railroad to build and maintain the crossing,[13] nor does this duty shift to the landowner merely because the latter occasionally takes it on himself to repair the gates;[14] but a landowner who has taken on himself the closing of an opening left in a fence by the railroad cannot thereafter hold the railroad liable in the absence of notice to the railroad to assume the responsibility.[15] Under statutes requiring the landowner to make repairs, subject to existing contract rights between the company and landowner which the statute does not change,[16] the railroad is not liable for the landowner's default.[17]

§ 586. —— Notice of Defects; Duty to Inspect

Except where the defects were in the original construction, the railroad company ordinarily will not be liable for failing to repair defects of which it has no knowledge, but it will be liable where it has notice thereof.

Except where the defects were in the original construction,[18] the railroad company ordinarily will not be liable for failing to repair defects of which it has no knowledge,[19] but it will be liable where it has notice,[20] or where the defect has existed for such a length of time that it should by reasonable care and diligence have been discovered, and a sufficient time has elapsed within which to repair it.[21]

a. Duty of Railroad

Generally a railroad company must exercise reasonable care to see that the gates or bars at private or farm crossing are kept closed, but if the gates or bars are properly constructed and are left open by the landowner or by strangers without the knowledge of the company it will not be liable unless they have remained open for such length of time that it should in the exercise of reasonable care have discovered their condition.

Under statutes expressly so providing or construed to have that effect, railroads have been held liable for injuries to animals coming on to the right of way through open gates at private crossings independently of their negligence or of their knowledge of the conditions.[22] The general rule, however, under statutes requiring a sufficient fence or establishing liability of the railroad for failure to construct and maintain a sufficient fence, is that the railroad must exercise reasonable care to see that the gates or bars at private or farm crossings are kept closed,[23] the duty being included in that of maintaining a sufficient fence of which the gates or bars constitute a part,[24] but that only reasonable care on the part of the railroad is required,[25] and that, in the absence of evidence showing that such care was not used, the company is not liable.[26] It is not required to keep a patrol along the line of the railroad,[27] or to station watchmen at farm crossings to see that gates or bars are kept closed,[28] even though the gates are frequently and habitually left open by persons passing through, and the railroad company knows it.[29]

If the crossing is also used by the railroad or its customers the company will be liable for injuries due to the gate being left open through the negligence of its servants[30] or persons transacting business with the company.[31] If a railroad constructs gates at points where they are not required or permitted, the burden is on the company to see that they are kept closed.[32] If the gates or bars are properly constructed and are left open by the landowner or by strangers without the knowledge of the company, ordinarily it will not be liable,[33] the company being entitled to a reasonable time to discover that they are open and to close them,[34] but the company will be liable if they have remained open for such length of time that it should in the exercise of reasonable care have discovered their condition.[35] The condition of the fastening is immaterial[36] unless it is so bad and has existed for so long a time as to charge the railroad with knowledge that leaving the gate open is the natural and probable consequence of the defective condition.[37]

b. Duty of Landowner

As between the railroad company and the person for whose benefit the crossing is maintained, the duty of keeping the gates closed rests primarily on the owner of the crossing and he cannot recover for injury to animals if he or someone using the crossing with his permission left the gate open.

Such person cannot recover for injury to animals if he himself left the gates open,[40] or if they were left open by persons using the crossing and gates with his permission,[41] or by a trespasser,[42] although the company knew of it and failed to close them.[43] Also where the gates are left open by the landowner the company is not liable for animals which at the time of entry were pastured on the owner's land[44] or were trespassing thereon,[45] and it has been held even that third persons cannot recover on the theory that as to them the railroad's duty was to keep such gates closed,[46] although there is some authority to the contrary.[47]

Under statutes requiring that all gates and bars at farm crossings must be kept closed by the owner of the crossing, the company is not liable to third persons for injuries due to the failure of the owner of the crossing to do so,[48] even though a prior, separate entry of the animal on the railroad's right of way was due to the railroad's failure to fence as required by statute;[49] but the railroad is liable if the animal did not enter through the owner's gate, but at some other point which the railroad is bound to protect,[50] or if it entered at the owner's gate, but the gate had been left open by the railroad's servants.[51]

Statutes stipulating that it is the duty of the owner to keep gates closed apply to farm crossings constructed prior to the enactment of the statute,[52] but not to openings other than farm crossings.[53] Under statutes requiring crossings for the owner's exclusive benefit where a railroad passes through inclosures, and making it the duty of the owner to keep the gates closed, a crossing ceases to be for the exclusive benefit of the owner within the meaning of the statute when a lane is opened connecting it directly with the public highway and without gates at the intersection with the highway.[54] Where a contract between a railroad and a landowner provided that gates at a private crossing might be kept open at the landowner's risk, the landowner did not assume the risk of injury to his animals passing through the open gates and entering the railroad right of way at some other point which it had failed to fence in accordance with the statutory requirements.[55]

§ 588. Cattle Guards and Wing Fences

In the absence of an express requirement, railroad companies are not obliged to construct cattle guards at private or farm crossings.

In the absence of an express requirement, railroad companies are not obliged to construct cattle guards at private or farm crossings,[56] the gates or bars required at such crossings being held to be a sufficient protection to prevent animals from going upon the tracks at such places.[57] Where a statute in express terms requires it, cattle guards must be placed at farm crossings,[58] or at private passways used by the public where there are terminal points of the railroad fences,[59] and, where the statute requires their construction on notice from the landowner, a voluntary construction of them by the railroad without notice obligates the company to build proper and effective ones[60] and to keep them in good repair.[61]

Where the statute requires cattle guards at such crossings and makes no provision for gates, a fence with gates but without cattle guards is not a proper fence.[62] Statutes are construed as applying only to public crossings, and not to private ways or farm crossings, which in terms require the construction of cattle guards at "all wagon crossings,"[63] at "all railroad crossings,"[64] or at "all road crossings"[65] No obligation to construct cattle guards at farm crossings rests on the railroad merely because a statute relieves the railroad from all responsibility for keeping the gate closed.[66]

Where, however, the statute requires cattle guards to be placed at the point where the railroad enters an "inclosure," a fenced lane, being an "inclosure," crossing the tracks must be protected by properly constructed and maintained cattle guards at the point where the railroad enters it.[67] The voluntary construction of wing fences where the crossing is already sufficiently protected by gates in conformity with statutory requirements does not impose on the railroad a duty to maintain them for all time.[68]

§ 589. Gates or Openings at Places Other than Farm Crossings

If a railroad company constructs or permits the use of gates or bars at places other than farm crossings, they must be so constructed and maintained as to serve the purposes of a fence, and the company must see that they are kept closed, and will be liable for injuries to animals resulting from its breach of duty therein.

A railroad company has a right to permit the use of gates or bars at places other than farm crossings or to construct them itself if it shall deem it advisable to do so;[69] but they must be so constructed and maintained as to serve the purposes of a fence,[70] and the company must see that they are kept closed.[71] Railroads are not liable, however, for failure to close gates in fences off the right of way.[72] If the railroad for its own purposes makes an opening in the fence through which animals enter and are injured, it will be liable,[73] and if it knowingly permits others to make or use openings it will be liable to third persons whose animals enter through such openings and are injured,[74] but not to the person by whom or for whose use and convenience the opening was made or permitted,[75] unless the railroad had expressly agreed to construct a gate at such opening and failed to do so within a reasonable time.[76]

§ 590. Liability of Owner of Crossing to Owner of Animal Injured

In the absence of any fault on the part of the railroad company, the owner of a private crossing is liable for injuries to animals of a third person entering the right of way through a properly constructed gate willfully left open by the owner of the crossing, provided the animal is not a trespasser upon the premises of the owner of the crossing.

Independently of the liability of the railroad for injuries to animals of third persons entering the right of way through open gates at private crossings, which has been considered supra § 587, the owner of the crossing will be liable to the owner of the animal injured, if the gates are properly constructed and, without any fault on the part of the railroad, the owner of the crossing willfully leaves them open, provided the animal is not a trespasser upon the premises of the owner of the crossing.[77] The landowner is not liable to the owner of animals which were wrongfully upon his premises,[78] even under a statute expressly requiring the owner of the crossing to maintain the gates or bars and relieving the railroad company from any liability by reason of his failure to do so[79] Under a statute providing that "any person who shall willfully take down, open or remove any such fence, cattle guard or crossing, or any portion thereof, or allow the same to be taken down, opened or removed, or who, having lawfully taken down bars or opened gates in such fences for the purpose of passing through the same, shall not immediately replace or close the same," shall be fined and in addition be liable to the party injured for all damages resulting therefrom, it has been held that the failure of the owner of a crossing to reconstruct gates, originally erected by the railroad, after they had been broken down by his runaway horses, driven by his employee, is not a "willful" act or omission making the owner of the crossing liable under the statute to the owner of an animal which goes from the former's land through the broken down gates on to the railroad track and is killed.[80]

§ 591. Care and Liability as to Animals on or near Crossing

In approaching a private or farm crossing those in charge of a train must keep a lookout to avoid injury to animals lawfully upon the crossing, but in the absence of statute or agreement the railroad company is not required to give warning of the approach of the train or to slow up or stop the train.

In approaching private or farm crossings those in charge of the train must keep a lookout to avoid injury to animals which might be lawfully upon the crossing;[81] but the railroad company is not required, in the absence of statute, to give any warning of the approach of its train,[82] or, in the absence of agreement with the landowner to do so, to slow up or stop its trains in order to ascertain whether animals are upon or near the crossing.[83]

§ 592. To Whom Liable, and Estoppel

The right to recover against a railroad company for failure to fence or to provide and maintain gates or bars extends to owners of injured animals who are not owners of the adjoining land; but the railroad is not liable as to any landowner who forbids the construction of gates or bars, or who requests or consents to an open crossing, or agrees to construct the gates himself.

Under some statutes it has been held that the right to recover against a railroad company for injuries to animals resulting from failure to fence or to provide and maintain gates or bars is extended to owners of injured animals who are not owners of the adjoining land.[84] A railroad will not be liable, however, for failing to construct gates or bars as to any landowner who forbids their construction,[85] or who requests or consents to an open crossing,[86] or who agrees to construct the gates himself;[87] but it has been held that the landowner's acquiescence does not excuse the railroad from exercising ordinary care to keep the gate and fastening in reasonably good repair.[88]

Liability to third persons. The liability of the railroad to third persons remains unaffected by the landowner's request or agreement,[89] but, where the statute expressly makes it the duty of the owner of a farm crossing to construct and maintain the gates or bars, the railroad is not liable to third persons for his failure to do so,[90] the statute, however, not applying to crossings other than farm crossings.[91]

D. INJURY BY RUNNING ON ROADBED, BRIDGES, OR TRESTLES

§ 593. In General

In the absence of statute, a railroad company is not liable for injuries due to animals going upon bridges or trestles or falling into pitfalls upon its right of way.

In the absence of statute a railroad company is not required to floor bridges or trestles[92] or to erect railings or other safeguards at dangerous places to prevent accidents to animals which may wander upon the right of way,[93] and, apart from any liability imposed by statutes requiring fencing, will not, in the absence of negligence in the operation of its trains or on the part of its servants, be liable for injuries due to animals going upon bridges or trestles[94] or falling into pitfalls upon its right of way.[95]

Duty to extricate. It is the duty of a train crew to liberate an animal whose legs are caught between the ties of a railroad trestle if this can reasonably be done,[96] and the fact that it would have required time and would have delayed the train is no excuse for failure to do so.[97]

§ 594. Negligence in Extricating Animals

In the absence of a statute making liability depend on an actual collision between the train and the animal, the plaintiff may recover if the injury was due to negligence on the part of the railroad company's servants in extricating an animal from a bridge or a trestle.

Where animals are injured in being extricated from bridges and trestles, if the action is based on the neglect of the railroad company to fence its track, the liability will depend on whether under the particular statute an actual collision between the train and animal is necessary to render the company liable, as discussed supra § 568, but in an action not based on such a statute plaintiff may recover if the injury was due to negligence on the part of the company's servants;[98] although the company will not be liable if reasonable care and diligence was used, although by extraordinary diligence and the use of different means it might have been possible to extricate the animal without injury.[99]

E. NEGLIGENCE IN OPERATION OF TRAINS

§ 595. Signals

Ordinary care may, under some circumstances, require the blowing of a whistle or the ringing of a bell as a warning to animals, particularly where the duty to give such signals is imposed by statute.

In the absence of statutory requirements, or independently of them, ordinary care may, under some circumstances, require that the engineer should blow the whistle or ring the bell as a warning at crossings,[1] or if required by statute that the warning should be given at a greater distance from the crossing than the statute provides.[2] So also, a failure to give signals as a warning of the approach of trains at a place where men and teams are known to be at work about the track, while not negligence per se, may be negligence as matter of fact,[3] or under the circumstances of the particular case it may be negligence to back a train without giving a warning signal.[4]

It has been held in a few jurisdictions that statutes requiring the giving of signals by blowing a whistle or ringing a bell on approaching crossings are intended only as a warning to persons and have no application to unattended animals;[5] and that a railroad will not be liable for injuries to animals if the signals are not given.[6] However, it is generally held that these signals are intended as a protection to animals as well as to persons,[7] and if not given the railroad will be liable for any injuries to animals occasioned thereby,[8] without regard to the care exercised to discover the animal on the track[9] or to prevent the injury after the animal was discovered.[10] The rule has no application when the injuries are done by cars other than those drawn by an engine and under the control of an engineer,[11] as, for example, by the escape of a detached car which had been left standing upon a sidetrack.[12] If the statute requires the ringing of the bell "or"

blowing of the whistle, either is sufficient, and the company will not be liable unless it is shown that both were omitted.[13] A statutory requirement that the whistle shall be blown at a stated distance from a highway crossing only requires that the signal shall be given at such a point beyond the distance stated as would give reasonable notice of the train's approach.[14]

The statutes requiring crossing signals are intended only for the protection of persons and property at the crossing or about to use it, and a failure to give a crossing signal will not render the company liable for animals injured if not at the crossing[15] or about to use it;[16] but it is not necessary that the animal shall be on the actual intersection of the railroad and highway, and the company will be liable if the animal is on the track and so close to the highway that the accident may be fairly attributed to the neglect to give the signal.[17] Also the crossing signal statutes do not apply to private or farm crossings[18] unless they so provide,[19] or unless a private crossing is used as a public crossing during a temporary obstruction of traffic at the regular crossing.[20] Furthermore, the rule has no reference to a failure to give signals at some crossing other than the crossing where the accident happened.[21]

Dogs are within the application of statutes requiring that the whistle shall be sounded when animals are seen upon the track,[22] but the statutes do not apply to trespassing animals.[23] An animal is not a trespasser, however, within the application of this rule, although it is not lawful for stock to be at large, if it has escaped without any fault on the part of the owner and is upon the crossing where the right of the railroad company is not exclusive,[24] or merely because in crossing it has deviated slightly outside of the line of the highway.[25]

As a general rule, both at common law and under statutes, those in charge of a train must keep a lookout for stock on or near the track, and if they fail to do so and injury to animals results, the railroad company will be liable, the law requiring reasonable diligence and caution, taking into consideration the other duties of those in charge of the train.

As a general rule those in charge of a train must keep a lookout for stock on or near the track, and if they fail to do so, and animals are injured which could have been discovered in time to avoid the injury, the company will be liable,[26] without regard to whether or not they were actually seen,[27] or to the efforts subsequently made to avoid the injury,[28] or the impossibility of avoiding it after discovering the danger.[29] A failure to discover animals at a point on the track where discovery in time to avoid collision was impossible is not negligence[30] Especially must a lookout be maintained in approaching crossings,[31] including private or farm crossings,[32] or after receiving notice from a landowner that his animals have escaped and are possibly on the track;[33] but a knowledge that there might be animals on the track at a particular place cannot be implied or presumed from an occasional crossing.[34] A railroad does not relieve itself of the duty of lookout by paying the landowner for fencing, in states where the statute allows that to be done.[35] In the absence of special circumstances, a railroad is under no duty to keep a lookout for animals in fields adjoining the track in order to avoid frightening them with unnecessary noises.[36]

Statutes. In some jurisdictions under the express terms of a statute, a lookout must be maintained.[37] Where the statute does not impose the duty on any particular person in express terms, it is construed as requiring a lookout to be kept by either the engineer or fireman, but not both,[38] except at places where the engineer cannot see the track from his side of the engine, in which case the fireman must keep a lookout from the other side.[39] Lookout by the brakeman if he is in a position to see is a sufficient compliance with the statute.[40] A lookout must be kept for animals near, as well as directly on, the track,[41] notwithstanding the statute in terms relates to persons and property "upon the track;"[42] and the statute is construed as requiring the maintenance of a lookout for dogs,[43] although there is authority for the view that a statute in terms applicable to stock does not apply to dogs.[44] A statutory obligation on the engineer to be "always on the lookout ahead" will not be construed as placing an absolute liability for injuries on the railroad if it operates its engine backward with tender in front as it passes over a public crossing.[45] A statute requiring persons running trains to keep a lookout does not apply to railroad motorcars generally,[46] although it applies to employees of a railroad company running a motorcar for passengers.[47]

Degree of care. The law requires reasonable diligence and caution in keeping a lookout ahead, taking into consideration the other duties of those in charge of the train.[48] It is not necessary that the engineer should keep his eyes constantly on the track in front of him,[49] but the lookout must be as nearly continuous as such other duties will permit,[50] imposing on the persons charged with the duty the burden of satisfactorily explaining any failure on their part in its performance.[51] Reasonable care may, however, require a high degree of care at particular places,[52] as where the train emerges from a deep cut a very short distance before it crosses a highway,[53] or under particular conditions or circumstances,[54] as where stock is accustomed to graze on or about the tracks at a particular place, and that fact is known to the trainmen.[55] It is not

Construction of statute

(1) Statutes requiring railroads to keep engineer or fireman on locomotive on lookout ahead to stop train so as to avoid injury to animals on track are remedial as well as penal, and should be so construed as to effectuate true intent of legislature. —Gordon v. Probable presence of horses on trestle

(1) A railroad whose right of way was unfenced was chargeable with knowledge of the probable presence of horses on trestle in the open country, as respects railroad's liability for death of such horses when sufficient that the engineer was on the lookout at the time of the accident, if by proper care the animal could have been discovered sooner and in time to avoid the injury,[56] but a failure to keep a constant lookout even under a statute so requiring will not render the company liable if a proper lookout was maintained during the time affecting the particular injury complained of.[57]

Trespassing animals. The rule, generally adopted, is that a railroad owes no duty to the owner to keep a lookout for trespassing animals.[58] There is some authority to the contrary,[59] the rule in these jurisdictions requiring, however, only a reasonably careful, not a constant, lookout[60] The owner of a trespassing animal may not claim any benefit from the duty owed by the railroad to its passengers in this respect,[61] or from the fact that the injury occurs upon the crossing of a public highway if the animal was wrongfully upon the highway,[62] or from the duty owed to owners of animals rightfully on the public highway.[63]

§ 597. —— Effect of Stock Laws

According to some authorities, but not others, a lookout for animals on or near the track is not necessary in localities where it is unlawful for them to run at large

Some authorities hold that a lookout for animals on or near the track is not necessary in localities where it is unlawful for them to run at large.[64] Others hold that the duty exists,[65] although it has been held to be less accentuated[66] In other jurisdictions the existence of a stock law is held to be merely a circumstance to be considered by the jury in determining whether ordinary care was or was not used by the railroad[67] Where the stock law has been suspended, the duty to keep a lookout exists.[68]

§ 598. —— Effect of Fenced Track

In some jurisdictions the railroad is under no duty to keep a lookout for animals where its road is properly fenced as required by law, but in others it is held that whether the engineer should exercise diligence to keep such a lookout depends on the facts of the particular case.

Where its road is properly fenced as required by law, a railroad is under no legal obligation in some states to keep a lookout for animals which have broken through on to the track[69] In others it is held that whether the engineer should exercise diligence to keep a lookout for animals on a fenced track to a great extent depends on the facts of the particular case; at places not required to be fenced, such as public crossings and station grounds, the duty to keep a lookout exists,[70] but the duty is not absolute, ordinary care being all that is required.[71]

§ 599. —— Obstructions of View

A railroad company will be liable for injury to animals which it could have discovered in time to avoid the injury but for obstructions of view which it was the duty of the railroad to remove.

struck by passenger train —Friedman's Estate v Texas & Pac Ry Co., 25 So 2d 88, 209 La 540

(2) Railroad's failure by cattle guards or otherwise to protect live stock, which it knew usually grazed on or near unfenced right of way in vicinity of trestle from being trapped on floored portion at either end of trestle, the center section of which was not floored, constitutes negligence and hence railroad was liable to owner for value of horses killed — Friedman's Estate v Texas & Pac Ry Co, supra.

Turkeys

(1) Whether trainmen had an imperative duty to keep a lookout for turkeys, not prohibited to run at large at a place where turkeys were killed on the right of way, depended on the knowledge of such trainmen as to the probability of encountering such fowls at that place —Texas & P. Ry Co v Heathington, Tex Civ App, 115 S W 2d 495

(2) Where a railroad permitted a rank growth of vegetation along the right of way which made the place attractive for turkeys in search of food so as to constitute an implied invitation to turkeys to frequent the place, and which prevented the escape of the turkeys from an approaching train, the employees of the railroad were charged with the duty to use a degree of care that a reasonably prudent person would use under such circumstances to discover and to prevent injury to the turkeys —Texas & P Ry Co v Heathington, supra.

While it has been held negligence not to keep the right of way free from weeds, bushes, or anything which would conceal from those in charge of the train the presence of animals on or near the track, and the company will be liable for injury to animals which but for such obstructions of view could have been discovered in time to avoid the injury,[72] there is authority for the view that the railroad owes no such duty to the owners of stock.[73] Even though the obstructions to the view are placed on the right of way or owned by third persons, it is the right and duty of the railroad to remove them.[74] The clearing away of obstructions of view must extend to the outer bank of the side ditches which drain the track,[75] but not beyond those limits.[76] The railroad will not be liable if the train was equipped with proper lights and its servants were proceeding with a proper degree of care, where an injury is occasioned by an obstruction of view due to natural causes over which the company has no control,[77] or to the leaving of standing cars or other material near the track for legitimate railroad purposes,[78] or where, even without the obstruction, the locomotive lights would not have disclosed the animals.[79]

§ 600. Lights

A railroad company operating trains at night must carry a good and sufficient headlight for the purpose of discovering stock upon the track, but it is not liable for injuries to animals due to a sufficient headlight being obscured by natural causes if a proper degree of care under the circumstances is exercised.

A railroad company has an unqualified right to carry a headlight on its locomotives whenever necessary or even conducive to the safety of the train and its passengers, although its effect may be to increase rather than diminish the danger to animals on the track;[80] and the company must in operating trains at night carry a good and sufficient headlight for the purpose of discovering stock upon the track,[81] its sufficiency to be determined by its utility as demonstrated by use, and not by the mere fact of its adoption by other railroads.[82] The liability for failure to have a sufficient headlight at night depends on whether, if there had been a sufficient headlight, the animal could have been seen in time to avoid the collision, if the engineer had been keeping a lookout[83] It is also negligence for a railroad to back trains at night without lights upon the rear of the train[84] or to operate a locomotive with its headlight obstructed by a box car or caboose which is being pushed by the engine.[85] If the headlight is sufficient and the injury is due to its light being obscured by natural causes, such as fog or snow, the company will not be liable if a proper degree of care under the circumstances is exercised.[86]

§ 601. Speed

a. In general
b. Statutes, ordinances, or other regulations
c. At crossings
d. In cities, towns, and villages
e. Effect of stock laws
f. Increasing speed where collision unavoidable

a. In General

With respect to animals on or near a railroad, in the absence of statutory or municipal regulation, railroad companies ordinarily may adopt whatever rate of speed they may deem advisable, provided it is reasonably safe, and they will not be liable for injuries to animals because of the rate of speed adopted if the company is not otherwise at fault.

With respect to animals on or near a railroad, the general rule is that in the absence of statutory or municipal regulation railroad companies ordinarily may adopt whatever rate of speed they may deem advisable provided it is reasonably safe and consistent with the safety of the passengers and property intrusted to their care[87] If the convenience and business of the public demand rapid transportation, railroad companies are not restrained from meeting this requirement because of the increased danger to animals which might be upon the track,[88] and will not be liable for such injuries because of the rate of speed adopted if not otherwise at fault,[89] even though the train was running on schedule time through fog or rain,[90] or even though the train was running faster than schedule in an effort to make up time,[91] a railroad not being required to operate a train at a speed which will enable it to be stopped within the distance that the engineer can see[92]

Subject to the rule of nonliability as to animals trespassing on its track and not seen by the engineer,[93] whatever rate of speed is adopted the company must exercise a proper degree of care to avoid injuries to animals,[94] which varies according to the danger of injury at a given place,[95] and existing conditions making it easy or difficult to perceive obstructions upon the track.[96] So, in the absence of statute or municipal regulation, no particular rate of speed is negligence per se,[97] but depends on the facts and circumstances of the particular case,[98] and therefore may be considered as an element of negligence in connection with other circumstances.[99]

In operating trains at night the rule in some states is that it is negligence to run trains at such a rate of speed that they could not be stopped by the use of the ordinary means and appliances within the distance that the engineer can see stock upon the track by the aid of the headlight,[1] unless from unknown causes the machinery and appliances have in the course of travel become defective,[2] or the intervention of natural causes has rendered them inefficient,[3] as where the light cast from a proper headlight is obscured by fog, rain, or snow;[4] and intervening natural conditions, such as fog or rain, will not constitute an excuse where the train is running at so great speed that it could not be stopped within the headlight limit, even though the night had been clear.[5] In other jurisdictions the rule making this distinction between day and night operation of trains has been expressly disapproved.[6]

Rounding curve at night
Where mules which entered railroad's right of way through a defective fence were killed by train at night on a curve, railroad, in order to avoid liability, was not required to reduce speed of train to a speed which would permit train's being stopped within distance an object could have been seen on track—Smith v. Thompson, La.App., 185 So. 71.

is generally regarded as negligence and renders the railroad liable for injuries to stock occurring within the limits to which the statutes or ordinances apply and which are directly due to such excessive speed.

A violation of statutes and ordinances limiting the speed at which trains may be operated at different places is generally regarded as negligence per se,[7] regardless of whether the statute so provides[8] or does not so provide[9] and independently of provisions for a fine therein,[10] and renders the railroad liable for injuries to stock occurring within the limits to which the statutes or ordinances apply and which are directly due to such excessive speed[11] In some jurisdictions this is the rule only where the action is based on the statute and it is so pleaded, a violation of the regulation being regarded in other cases merely as evidence of negligence;[12] in others a violation has been regarded as establishing merely a prima facie case of negligence;[13] and in others a violation has been regarded as having no probative force whatever on the issue of negligence which must be established independently of the regulation and its violation.[14]

There is a violation of the regulation within the meaning of the rule imposing liability therefor, if just previously to the collision the speed limit was exceeded and the accident was due to this fact,[15] even though at the instant of collision the train had been slowed down to the prescribed limit.[16] Where the limit fixed by regulation is not exceeded, there is no liability in the absence of other evidence of negligence.[17]

Territorial limitations and effect thereof. If the injury occurs outside the territory to which the speed regulations apply, the company is not liable unless otherwise negligent,[18] although just before inflicting the injury the train had been running within such limits in excess of the statutory speed.[19] An exception to this rule is made where the injury, although occurring outside the limits to which the statute or ordinance applies, is the proximate result of a violation of the speed regulations within such limits.[20]

Regulations of railroad commissioners do not govern in determining the liability of railroads for injuries to animals[21] except where the statute under which the commissioners act expressly so provides.[22]

c. At Crossings

While trains must be operated at crossings with greater care to avoid injury to animals which may rightfully be upon the track, even at crossings no particular rate of speed can be held to be negligence per se in the absence of specific statutory requirements.

At crossings trains must be operated with greater care to avoid injury to animals which may rightfully be upon the track;[23] but even at crossings no particular rate of speed can be held to be negligence per se, the question depending on the locality of the crossing and the amount of travel[24] In the absence of specific statutory requirements,[25] it is not negligence not to reduce the customary rate of speed at the crossing of an ordinary public highway in the absence of any special circumstances charging knowledge that an obstruction at such crossing was likely to be encountered,[26] and a statute requiring reduction of speed at certain crossings has no application to crossings not within the statutory description[27]

d. In Cities, Towns, and Villages

As bearing on the liability for injuring animals, trains should be run at a less rate of speed in cities, towns, and villages, and, while the limit of speed in such places may properly be fixed by statutory regulation, in the absence thereof no arbitrary rule can be laid down as to the rate of speed which would apply to all parts of a town.

As bearing on liability for injuring animals, trains should be run with a greater degree of care and at a less rate of speed in cities, towns, and villages,[28] but no arbitrary rule can be laid down as to the rate of speed which would apply to all parts of a town regardless of density of population and other local conditions.[29] The mere fact of a train passing a small station at which it was not required to stop without slackening its speed is not sufficient to show negligence.[30] It has been held to be negligence to run a train at a dangerous rate of speed through a village where animals are permitted to run at large and are liable to be upon the track.[31]

A statute prohibiting the running of trains over a certain speed "through any town, city, or village" applies to every municipality regardless of its size, number of families within its limits, or scope of its activities,[32] and to the entire city, town, or village within its legal or corporate limits without regard to the irregular and variable lines of settlement and improvement.[33] Whether or not there is a violation of the regulation within the territorial limits is determined by the speed at the point of entering the territory,[34] even though the train was being slowed down at that point and later the speed was within the prescribed limit.[35] Where the prohibition of the statute is expressly limited to the "running of cars and locomotives by steam," trains propelled by electricity are exempt.[36]

If an animal is suffered by its owner to run at large in violation of law and is injured while unlawfully upon a railroad track, the fact that the train was being run at a high rate of speed will not necessarily render the company liable, but if the animal had been confined and escaped without the owner's knowledge or consent the railroad may be liable if the train was running in excess of the lawful speed limit.

If an animal is suffered by its owner to run at large in violation of law and is killed or injured while unlawfully upon a railroad track, the fact that the train was being run at a high rate of speed or without proper care in other respects will not render the company liable unless its servants, after discovering the animal, could by the exercise of proper care have avoided the injury,[37] but if the animal had been confined and escaped without the owner's knowledge or consent, then, even though it is running at large in violation of law, a railroad will be liable to the owner for injuring or killing it if the train at the time of the accident was running at a speed in excess of the lawful limit.[38]

f. Increasing Speed Where Collision Unavoidable

If a collision between a train and animals upon the track is inevitable, the company is not liable because the engineer increases the speed in order to diminish the danger to the train.

If animals appear upon the track at a point so near a train as to make a collision inevitable, the company is not liable because the engineer increases the speed in order to diminish the danger to the train,[39] especially where there is evidence in the case to support the engineer's contention that it is safer for the train to come in contact with any moveable obstruction on the track at a high than at a low rate of speed.[40] If it is done for this purpose the fact that the speed is increased beyond the limit fixed by statute does not render the company liable for injuries caused while so running.[41]

§ 602. Control and Means of Control

It is the duty of railroad companies to equip their trains with sufficient brakes to stop the train within a reasonable time and distance, and to employ a sufficient number of brakemen properly to operate them, and they will be liable for injuries to animals resulting from neglect in this respect.

In order to guard against injuries to animals it is the duty of railroad companies to equip their trains with sufficient brakes to stop the train within a reasonable time and distance,[42] and to employ a sufficient number of brakemen properly to operate them,[43] and they will be liable for injuries to animals which in the absence of such neglect could have been prevented;[44] but railroads are not obliged to procure the best appliances regardless of cost for the management of their trains but only such as are usually and reasonably sufficient.[45] It is also negligent to leave cars standing on a descending grade without being securely fastened, and the company will be liable for injuries to stock caused by such cars escaping and running down the grade.[46]

§ 603. Precautions as to Animals Seen on or near Tracks

When animals are seen on or near railroad tracks, it is the duty of those in charge of the train to exercise ordinary care to avoid injuring them, and a failure to do so will render the company liable for injuries occasioned thereby, notwithstanding compliance with a statute requiring certain precautions to be taken.

When animals are seen on, or in dangerous proximity to, a railroad track, it is the duty of those in charge of the train to exercise ordinary care to avoid injuring them, taking into consideration the safety of the train and those on board, and a failure to do so will render the company liable for any injuries occasioned thereby;[47] and compliance with a statute requiring certain precautions to be taken will not relieve the company from its common-law duty to exercise such ordinary care.[48] What will amount to such care depends on the circumstances of the particular case,[49] and those in charge of the train are required to do only what an ordinarily prudent and skillful person would be expected to do under the circumstances[50]

It is not necessary, when animals are seen, to guard against every possible contingency which might result in injury to them;[51] and so, if animals on the track are not prevented by fences or embankments from leaving it, an engineer may assume that on blowing the whistle they will get off the track until he sees that they are not getting off and are in danger,[52] or that animals crossing the track in front of a train will not change their course and will come again on to the track;[53] but he has no right to assume, independently of the whistle being blown or of the animal's seeing the train, that an animal on the track knows that it is in a dangerous place and will get off before it is struck[54]

The requirement of ordinary care to avoid injuring animals seen on the track is conditioned on a reasonable apprehension by the engineer of a contingency endangering the safety of animals on the track,[55] and is subject to the paramount duty of caring for the safety of persons and property on the train.[56] If the safety of passengers is not involved and if there is opportunity to do so, it is clearly negligence, where animals are seen upon the track, for the engineer to proceed without giving any alarm or attempting to stop or check the speed of the train.[57] The doctrine of discovered peril has no application in the absence of evidence that the company's employees in charge of the train saw the animals on the track and realized their peril.[58]

Reversal of engine is not required if it would endanger the safety of persons on the train,[59] but a failure to reverse cannot be excused merely on the ground that reversal would injure the engine.[60]

Where the case involves the exercise of judgment and discretion on the part of the engineer, negligence cannot be predicated on a mistake of judgment merely,[61] but a mistake of judgment by the engineer will not relieve the company from liability if it is shown that the engineer did not possess reasonable skill and judgment and that the company was negligent in employing him.[62]

§ 604. —— Statutory Requirements

Where a statute specifically requires certain precautions to be taken when animals are seen upon the track, the railroad is liable if these precautions could have been safely taken under the circumstances and were not.

Where the statute specifically requires certain precautions to be taken when animals are seen upon the track, the railroad is liable if these precautions were not taken,[63] except where such precautions were impossible under the circumstances[64] or would endanger the safety of the train,[65] or where there was not sufficient time within which to observe all the precautions.[66] Where these statutes so provide, they apply only to injuries due to direct collision with the train,[67] and only when animals are actually on the track.[68] While the doctrine of discovered peril has no application in the absence of evidence that the railroad's trainmen saw the animals and realized their peril, evidence that the animals were on the track before the accident is sufficient to justify an inference that they were seen by the trainmen.[69]

The rule requiring an engineer to take precautions against injuring animals seen on or near the track applies to dogs and turkeys, but with its rigor somewhat relaxed in the case of dogs in view of their superior intelligence and agility.

The rule making it the duty of the engineer to take precautions against injuring animals seen on or near the track has been held to be applicable to dogs[70] and turkeys,[71] but with its rigor relaxed somewhat in the case of dogs in view of their superior intelligence,[72] unless the dog is caught in a trap where his intelligence or agility will not serve him,[73] or unless the dog appears to be helpless or indifferent to his peril,[74] which is not, however, of itself established by the fact that the dog was chasing a fox.[75] It has been held not necessary to stop the train as a precaution against injury to a dog[76] or a goose.[77]

A statute requiring the alarm whistle to be sounded where "any person, animal, or other obstruction" appears upon the track applies to dogs,[78] but does not require a separate blast for each one of a pack of dogs.[79] Where a statute declares an unregistered female dog to be a public nuisance, it has been held that statutes prescribing the duties of railroads on perceiving animals on the tracks can have no application thereto.[80]

§ 606. —— Trespassing Animals

A failure to exercise ordinary care, after their discovery, to prevent injury to animals trespassing upon the track subjects the railroad to liability.

While, as shown supra § 550, there are conflicting views as to the liability of railroads for injuries to trespassing animals generally, there is no conflict as to the care required after their discovery, and a failure then to exercise ordinary care to prevent the injury, consistent with the safety of passengers or property on the train, subjects the railroad to liability.[81] What acts of the engineer or fireman constitute ordinary care or the absence of it in a particular case depends on the circumstances existing at the time; and it has been held that the engineer on seeing trespassing animals on the track need not slacken the speed of his train,[82] especially where alarm signals have been given;[83] but it has been held that the engineer, if the safety of passengers will justify it, must use ordinary care to bring his train to a stop if necessary to avoid injury to the trespassing animal.[84]

§ 607. —— Duty to Stop or Slacken Speed in General

It is not the duty of an engineer to stop his train or slacken speed where animals are discovered on the track if they are in no present danger, or if such action would endanger the safety of the train and its passengers; but, if and when it becomes necessary to do so in order to avoid striking an animal, and it can be done with safety to the train, the engineer should stop or slacken speed.

It is not always the duty of an engineer to stop his train or slacken speed immediately where animals are discovered on the track,[85] as where the animals are in no present danger of injury,[86] or are in charge of a person apparently capable of looking after them;[87] and it is his duty not to stop or reduce speed if stopping or reducing speed would endanger the safety of the train and its passengers.[88] If and when it becomes necessary to do so in order to avoid striking an animal, however, the engineer should stop or slacken speed if it can be done with safety to the train,[89] as where the animal is approaching a trestle,[90] or is on a track inclosed by fences,[91] or on an embankment,[92] or whenever it becomes obvious to the engineer that collision cannot be avoided by merely blowing the alarm whistle.[93]

The engineer may not assume that animals will exhibit the same intelligence as persons in responding to such warning signals.[94] Checking the speed of the train will not of itself relieve the railroad from liability for injuries to animals, which might have been avoided by the exercise of reasonable care in taking other omitted precautions.[95]

§ 608. —— Animals near or Approaching Track

There is no duty to slacken speed or stop if there is no reasonable ground for apprehension on the part of an engineer that an animal discovered near the track will sustain injuries because of the failure to do so; but a failure to slacken speed, or stop if consistent with safety to the train, is negligence where the animal, when seen, is approaching the track or in dangerous proximity thereto.

The same degree of care to avoid collision is not generally required when the animal is near the track as when it is on the track,[96] and there is no duty to slacken speed or stop if there is no reasonable ground for apprehension on the part of the engineer that the animal will sustain injuries because of his failure to do so,[97] as where it is grazing or standing quietly and manifesting no indication of coming on the track,[98] or where it is in harness and left standing in proximity thereto[99]

The rule is not affected by the circumstances that the animal is near a highway crossing,[1] or by a statute requiring engineers on discovering obstructions on the track to use all means within their power to stop the train, the statute having no application to animals near the track but not on it;[2] nor is a statute requiring trains to be stopped at a place where two railroads cross applicable where an animal was killed in the open country at a private crossing;[3] but a failure to slacken speed, or stop if consistent with safety to the train, is negligence where the animal, when seen, is approaching the track,[4] or in dangerous proximity thereto,[5] or is frightened and runs about wildly, and is as likely, in its fright, to run onto the track as from it.[6] No recovery against the railroad can be had if, when the animal is first seen, without any fault on the part of the company, collision has already occurred,[7] or, as shown infra § 610, where the collision is unavoidable.

Duty as dependent on subsequent movements of animal. Even if the circumstances when the animal is first seen do not require slowing down or stopping, such circumstances do not relieve those in charge of the train from the duty of maintaining a careful lookout as to their subsequent movements;[8] and if it can safely be done the train should be slowed down or stopped whenever there is apparent danger of injury,[9] as where the animal is in dangerous proximity to the track,[10] or is seen moving toward the track,[11] or running along the side of the track under circumstances making it probable that it will come on it,[12] or the circumstances are such as to make it probable that the animal will run on a bridge, trestle, or culvert and be injured,[13] or its escape from the immediate vicinity of the track would be difficult or impossible because of fences, embankments, or other obstructions[14] If, however, the animal, although on the track when first seen, moves off with no apparent indication of going on again, it is not negligence for the engineer not to slacken speed.[15]

§ 609. —— Stock Alarms

Whether a failure to blow a whistle or ring a bell so as to frighten animals away from the track is negligence depends on the circumstances of the particular case, but ordinarily it is the duty of the engineer to use such precautions to warn animals as soon as they are discovered on, in dangerous proximity to, or approaching, the track track,[17] or in dangerous proximity to it,[18] or approaching it,[19] and a failure to do so is at least some evidence of negligence.[20] No alarm is necessary if the animal is in no apparent danger,[21] or where the animal suddenly comes onto the track at a point so close to the train that the sounding of an alarm would be futile,[22] or was impossible,[23] or where the animal apparently saw the train and was getting out of its way as quickly as it could,[24] or where the sounding of the alarm might reasonably have increased rather than diminished the danger;[25] and even a statutory requirement to sound the alarm does not make a failure to comply negligence, where it is impossible for the engineer to do it in time to avoid the collision.[26]

§ 610. —— Where Collision Is Unavoidable

Railroad companies are not liable for unavoidable injuries to animals, and are not required to take useless precautions after discovering their peril too late to avoid a collision with them.

If animals come suddenly and unexpectedly on a railroad track so near to the train, or without any fault on the part of the company are not discovered until so near, that the accident cannot be avoided, the company will not be liable,[27] although no efforts were made to prevent it,[28] particularly if by attempting the impossible the chances of injury to the train and its passengers would have been increased.[29] In such cases it is not necessary after seeing the animals on or near the track to attempt to stop or slacken the speed of the train,[30] but on the contrary, as considered supra § 601 f, the speed may be increased if the danger of injury to the train would thereby be lessened. The fact that the train could not be stopped after the animal actually got on the track will not relieve the company from liability if reasonable care demanded that other precautions should have been previously taken;[31] it is otherwise if the circumstances up to that time did not require such precautions to be taken and recovery is sought on the theory of discovered peril,[32] or if, as soon as circumstances did require it, such precautions were taken.[33]

F. PROXIMATE CAUSE

§ 611. In General

In order to render a railroad company liable for injuries to animals, it must appear that its negligent act or omission was the proximate cause of the injury or one of several concurring efficient causes other than negligence of the plaintiff.

It must affirmatively appear, in order to render a railroad company liable for injury to animals, that its negligent act or omission or its violation of statutory duty was the proximate cause of the injury,[34] or one of several concurring efficient causes, other than negligence on the part of plaintiff.[35] In order to establish proximate cause, a direct causal connection must be established between defendant's negligence or misconduct and the injury complained of.[36] The liability extends only to injuries which are the direct and natural consequences of the negligent act, not necessarily including injuries which would not have occurred but for defendant's act.[37]

The company will not be liable, although negligent, where the immediate cause of the injury is an independent intervening agency;[38] but it will be liable for all damages which follow in the natural and ordinary course of events as the result of its negligence where the intervening agency is not itself an efficient cause,[39] or where it is set in motion by the original wrong of the company,[40] and the test is not whether the particular injury might have been foreseen but whether it is the natural and proximate result of the negligent act or omission complained of.[41]

Two theories of accident. The fact that there are two theories as to how the accident happened does not reduce the cause to a speculative basis when both theories are grounded on the same cause and both are supported by evidence.[42]

§ 612. Unavoidable Accident

Railroad companies are not liable merely because an animal is killed or injured by its trains where the injury is the result of unavoidable accident.

Railroad companies cannot be held liable merely because an animal is killed or injured by its trains where the injury is the result of unavoidable accident.[43] So, if animals suddenly come on the track in front of a train which is properly equipped and operated in a lawful and proper manner, or, without any fault on the part of those in charge of the train, are not seen until too late to stop the train or otherwise avoid the injury, the company will not be liable;[44] nor can a failure to make any effort to avoid the injury be held a proximate cause thereof if it appears that nothing which might have been done would under the circumstances of the case have been successful.[45]

§ 613. Frightening Animals

Where injuries result from the fright of an animal caused by the negligent operation of a train, the negligence will be held to be the proximate cause of the injuries.

Where animals are frightened by the negligent operation of a train, this negligence will be held to be the proximate cause of resulting injuries sustained either by the frightened animal,[46] or inflicted by it on other animals in the course of its flight;[47] but the company will not be liable for

Railroad's failure by cattle guards or otherwise to protect livestock, which it knew usually grazed on or near unfenced right of way in vicinity of trestle spanning bayou, from being trapped on floored portion at either end of trestle, the center section of which was not floored, constitutes a contributing cause of death of horses struck by passenger train rounding curve at night at such speed it could not be stopped after horses could be seen on trestle.—Friedman's Estate v. Permitting growth of vegetation frequented by grasshoppers attractive to turkeys

Although a railroad would not be required to eradicate insects from vegetation along the right of way, the railroad would be liable for negligence in permitting a growth of vegetation along the right of way which was frequented by grasshoppers so as to become attractive to turkeys in search of food if such act was the proximate cause of the loss of turkeys which were run over by a train—Texas & P Ry Co v Heathington, Tex Civ App., 115 S W.2d 495 injuries sustained by frightened animals where the fright was not due to any negligence on the part of its servants in the operation of the train,[48] unless it can be said to be due to some other concurrent negligent act for which the railroad is responsible.[49] It is immaterial whether the animal was struck by the train and thrown onto a fence and was injured, or whether it was so frightened that it jumped on the fence in an effort to escape from the train.[50]

§ 614. Signals, Alarms, and Lookouts

Negligence in failing to give required signals or maintain a proper lookout will not render a railroad company liable for an injury to an animal caused by a train unless such negligence was the proximate cause of the injury.

In order to render a railroad company liable for injuries to animals on the ground that signals on approaching public crossings were not given as required by statute, it must affirmatively appear that the omission was the cause of the injury complained of;[51] and the railroad is not liable if there is no evidence that the accident would have been avoided had the signals been given,[52] or given earlier.[53] A failure to blow the alarm whistle as required by statute to frighten animals from the track is not the proximate cause of the injury where the animal was already caught in a cattle guard,[54] or was already frightened by the train and running away from it and was not hit by the train but injured itself in its flight.[55] So, also, negligence on the part of the engineer as to keeping a lookout for stock must have caused or contributed directly to the injury complained of.[56]

§ 615. Rate of Speed and Means of Control

Unless such negligence was the cause of the injury, a railroad company is not liable merely because at the time of the accident the train was running at a prohibited or dangerous rate of speed or was not under proper control.

Unless such negligence is shown to have been the cause of the injury complained of, a railroad company will not be liable merely because at the time of the accident the train was running at a prohibited[57] or dangerous[58] rate of speed, or the speed was not checked as required by statute on approaching a public crossing;[59] or the brakemen were not at their posts.[60] Where there is testimony that the cattle could have been driven from the track in time to save them, if the train had not been going so fast, however, a recovery by plaintiff cannot be denied on the theory that the railroad's violation of the speed ordinance was not the proximate cause of the injury.[61]

G. CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE OF OWNER

§ 616. Availability and Effect as Defense

The owner of animals must exercise ordinary care to prevent their injury by railroad companies, and, if he fails to do so, and his failure contributes directly to the injury, he cannot recover.

The owner of animals must exercise ordinary care to prevent their injury by railroad companies,[62] and, if he fails to do so, and his failure contributes directly to the injury complained of, he cannot recover.[63] Contributory negligence is available as a defense, even though it consists merely of plaintiff's violation of a statutory duty,[64] provided it contributes directly to the injury.[65] It has been held that the availability of this defense is in no way affected by the statute making railroads liable for injuries to live stock unless the railroad can prove that the injury was committed without any negligence on its part.[66] Where injuries to an animal resulted solely from its being caught between crossties in a railroad bridge, necessary efforts of the owner in extricating the animal do not militate against his right of recovery from the railroad,[67] even though in his attempts to extricate the animal it was so injured that it had to be killed.[68]

§ 617. —— Proximate Cause

In order to preclude recovery, the plaintiff's negligence must be a proximate cause of the injury.

In order to preclude recovery, plaintiff's negligence must be a proximate cause of the injury.[69] A plaintiff not entirely without fault may recover if his negligence is remote, and the railroad's negligence is the proximate cause of the injury.[70]

§ 618. —— Injury Avoidable notwithstanding Contributory Negligence

Notwithstanding plaintiff's negligence, he may recover if at the time of the injury it might have been avoided by defendant in the exercise of ordinary care.

Although plaintiff was negligent, he may recover if at the time the injury occurred it might have been avoided by defendant in the exercise of ordinary care,[71] or if, although the animal was a trespasser, the injury might have been avoided by such care after the animal was discovered.[72] The doctrine does not apply, however, if plaintiff is guilty of a continuing negligence up to the time of the accident and might have himself avoided the collision if he had been in the exercise of due care.[73]

§ 619. —— In Actions Based on Statutory Liability

Contributory negligence is ordinarily a good defense in an action for injury to animals based on statutory grounds, although in some jurisdictions it is held that contributory negligence is no defense to an action based on a statute requiring railroads to construct and maintain fences and imposing liability for injuries to animals caused by their failure to do so.

Contributory negligence is a good defense to an action for injury to animals whether the action is based on common-law or statutory grounds.[74] So it is held that contributory negligence is a defense under statutes in terms making a railroad liable for all damages to stock done by its cars or locomotives,[75] or damages due to a failure to give signals,[76] or making proof of the injury prima facie evidence of negligence and placing the burden of proof on the company to show that the injury was not due to its negligence.[77]

Under fencing statutes. In some jurisdictions, where the action is based on a statute requiring railroads to construct and maintain fences and imposing liability for injuries to animals caused by their failure to do so, it is held that contributory negligence on the part of the owner is no defense,[78] in actions based on either a total failure to fence or a failure to keep the fences in a proper state of repair,[79] but the rule does not apply where the accident occurred at a place not required to be fenced,[80] and, as considered infra § 621, it does not permit a recovery where a person willfully abandons an animal to destruction or voluntarily exposes it to a known danger.

In other jurisdictions requiring fencing and imposing liability for failure to fence, contributory negligence has been held to be a defense even in case of a total failure to fence.[81] Where the statute expressly provides that every railroad company failing to fence its tracks against stock running at large shall be liable for all injuries unless occasioned by the willful act of the owner or his agent, the same rule of absolute liability of the railroad except for injuries caused by plaintiff's willful acts is followed;[82] but this absolute liability, in the absence of a willful act, applies only to stock running at large and not when under the control of the owner.[83] Where a fencing statute expressly provides that contributory negligence may be set up as a defense, such defense is available.[84]

§ 620. —— Where Negligence of Railroad Is Willful, Wanton, or Gross

If animals are injured through the wanton or willful misconduct of railroad employees, the company will be liable notwithstanding the owner may have been negligent or permitted his animals to be unlawfully at large.

If animals are injured through the wanton or willful misconduct of the railroad company's employees, the company will be liable therefor notwithstanding the owner may have been negligent,[85] or permitted his animals to be unlawfully at large.[86] Where the killing is due to the operation of a train, willful negligence can be predicated only on the fact that the men in charge of the train saw the animals in their place of danger in time to avoid injuring them.[87]

§ 621. —— Willful and Intentional Acts of Owner

A person cannot recover for injuries to an animal which he willingly abandons to destruction or voluntarily exposes to a known danger, even under fencing statutes where ordinary contributory negligence is not a defense.

A person cannot recover for injuries to an animal which he willingly abandons to destruction or voluntarily exposes to a known danger.[88] The rule applies to cases under the fencing statutes where ordinary contributory negligence on the part of plaintiff is not a defense,[89] especially where the statute in express terms provides for liability of the railroad unless the injuries are occasioned by the willful act of the owner or his agent.[90]

To constitute a willful act, there must be something more than mere negligence; there must be a positive act in some way connected with the injury,[91] as where the owner turns out stock directly on a railroad right of way,[92] or permits a blind animal to run at large in the vicinity of a railroad track,[93] or stands by and willfully refuses to drive an animal from the track out of the way of an approaching train where he has ample time and opportunity to do so.[94] It has been held not to be a willful act to turn an animal out in a highway for the purpose of driving it across a railway track to a pasture,[95] or to leave stock on land adjoining a railroad track knowing that a gate in the railroad fence is defective;[96] or to allow stock to run at large on the owner's premises in close proximity to a railroad track;[97] or to permit stock to be at large in violation of stock laws.[98]

§ 622. Driving Animals over or along Tracks

If a person in charge of animals, when attempting to drive them across a railroad track, fails to exercise ordinary care, and thereby contributes to the injury, the owner cannot recover.

If a person in charge of animals, when attempting to drive them across a railroad track, fails to exercise ordinary care and thereby contributes to the injury complained of, the owner cannot recover,[99] the forfeiture of his right to recover depending on the acts of the driver, independently of his age,[1] or the extent to which intoxication had deprived him of the control of his actions.[2] Subject to the qualification that he take all reasonable precautions,[3] the owner has a right to presume that the railroad will operate its trains in a lawful and proper manner[4] and that at public crossings the crossing itself will be in a safe condition.[5] He is not obliged to ascertain definitely that the daily train has passed.[6] What constitutes ordinary care on the part of the driver depends on the circumstances of the particular case.[7]

Duty to stop, look, and listen. Before going onto the track, a person must look and listen for approaching trains,[8] even though the regular train has just passed.[9] There is no particular distance from the crossing at which a person must look and listen, each case depending on its own circumstances,[10] but extra precautions must be observed where there are other noises which would interfere with such person's hearing approaching trains,[11] or where the view of the track in either direction is obstructed before reaching the point of danger;[12] and, where the view of the track is so obstructed, it is the duty of a person driving a drove of animals along the road before him to go forward and look for approaching trains before attempting to cross.[13]

§ 623. Use of Own Premises Adjoining or near Track notwithstanding Absence of, or Defect in, Fence

Where a railroad company is required by law to fence its tracks, it is not contributory negligence for an adjoining landowner, knowing the road to be unfenced, to turn stock into his inclosure or to pasture them on his own fields through or along which the railroad runs.

Where a railroad company is required by law to fence its tracks, it is not contributory negligence on the part of an adjoining landowner, although knowing the road to be unfenced, to turn stock into his inclosure or to pasture them on his own fields through or along which the railroad runs,[14] or in which it has constructed a farm crossing without gates,[15] or to allow his stock to graze on a highway if the highway is on his own land.[16] In the absence of any statute or agreement as to fences, it is ordinarily held not to be contributory negligence for a landowner to allow his stock to run on his own land through which an unfenced railroad runs,[17] although there may be other circumstances in the case precluding a recovery.[18]

Although there are decisions to the contrary,[19] it is generally held that it is not contributory negligence for an adjoining landowner to turn his stock on his own premises adjacent or accessible to fences, which it is the duty of the railroad to keep in repair either under statute[20] or by contract with the landowner,[21] although he knows that they are out of repair,[22] or knows that the cattle guards are defective,[23] or that the gates or bars in such fences which it is the duty of the company to maintain are defective or insecure,[24] or that his animals had previously escaped from the inclosure because of the same defects;[25] and it is not contributory negligence for another to pasture his cattle in a field adjacent to the track with knowledge of the defective condition of the fence or gate[26] The existence of a stock law does not affect the right of a landowner to permit his stock to run on his own inclosed premises[27]

§ 624. Conduct with Respect to Fences, Gates, and Bars

a. Failure to construct and maintain
b. Knowledge of defects and failure to notify railroad
c. Constituting cause of defect or of failure to repair
d. Failure to keep gate or bars closed

a. Failure to Construct and Maintain

In the absence of any statute or agreement requiring him to do so, it is not contributory negligence in a landowner not to fence against a railroad which runs through or along his own land, but the general rule is otherwise if the landowner has expressly agreed to construct, maintain, or repair the fence or gates.

In the absence of any statute or agreement requiring him to do so, it is not contributory negligence in a landowner not to fence against a railroad which runs through or along his own land,[28] even though the railroad is required by law to fence its tracks and has failed to do so[29] The fact that the statute provides that in such cases the landowner may construct the fences and recover the value thereof from the railroad does not change the rule.[30] In the absence of statute or agreement, it is not contributory negligence for a landowner to fail to maintain or to keep in repair the fences or gates dividing his land from the railroad right of way,[31] even though the statute allows him to do so if the railroad does not,[32] unless the defect is easily repaired without any considerable cost or labor and a failure to do so would probably result in an injury to his stock.[33]

Under statute or agreement. If the landowner has expressly agreed to construct, maintain, or repair the fences or gates, he cannot recover for injuries to his animals due to a failure to comply with his agreement,[34] even where the railroad is required by statute to fence,[35] except in jurisdictions where it is held that the landowner's breach is not a proximate cause of the injury,[36] and, where the agreement is a covenant running with the land, a failure by a subsequent owner of the land to comply with its terms is contributory negligence barring his recovery.[37] So, also, where by statute it is the duty of the landowner to assist in constructing and maintaining the railroad fences as division fences, he cannot recover where his neglect in this respect has contributed to the injury[38]

If the landowner, having agreed to build the fence, accepts without objection a fence built for him by the railroad, he cannot recover for injuries to his stock due to failure to keep the fence in repair under the terms of his agreement.[39] If the landowner builds a defective fence as agent for the railroad and the railroad adopts it, the defective construction is not regarded as his contributory negligence barring his recovery against the railroad,[40] although there is authority to the contrary.[41] The rule barring the landowner's recovery for injuries to his stock, occasioned by defects which under the terms of a statute or agreement it is his duty to remedy, is not affected by the fact that the defect was due to accident or casualty without any fault on his part,[42] even though due to fire communicated from the locomotives of the railroad company.[43]

b. Knowledge of Defects and Failure to Notify Railroad

It is not contributory negligence for a landowner, knowing of the defect in the fence, to pasture his cattle in his adjoining land without notifying the company thereof or requesting it to repair the fence, unless the landowner is under a duty to give such notice or to repair the fence himself.

It is not contributory negligence for a landowner, knowing of the defect in the fence, to pasture his cattle in his land adjoining without requesting the company to repair the fence,[44] or without notifying the company of its existence where the circumstances are such as to charge the railroad with notice,[45] but failure of a landowner to notify the railroad of the defect is contributory negligence where the requirement of notice is a reasonable one under the circumstances,[46] or where the landowner was required by statute to assist in keeping the fence in repair as a division fence,[47] or had expressly agreed with the railroad that he would keep it in repair,[48] or had voluntarily undertaken to repair it without notice to the railroad and did so in such a manner as to conceal without effectively remedying the defect[49]

c. Constituting Cause of Defect or of Failure to Repair

It is contributory negligence barring recovery if the defect which occasioned the injury was caused by the plaintiff himself.

It is contributory negligence barring recovery if the defect which occasioned the injury was caused by plaintiff himself,[50] or if the failure of the railroad to remedy the defect was due to plaintiff's act,[51] or if the defect resulted from plaintiff's failure to exercise reasonable care in the use of the fence,[52] or, if he is using a field belonging to another, from the owner's failure to use such care.[53] Plaintiff's acts are not contributory negligence, however, in the absence of proof that they were the cause of the injury.[54]

d. Failure to Keep Gates or Bars Closed

If the plaintiff's animals are injured by reason of his failure to keep gates or bars closed, it is generally held that he is guilty of contributory negligence barring his recovery therefor

If a landowner fails to keep the gates closed at a farm crossing maintained for his convenience, and his animals escape and are injured by reason of his neglect, it is generally held that he is guilty of contributory negligence barring his recovery therefor,[55] unless the gate is out of repair and its being left open is due to difficulty in closing and plaintiff is not chargeable with lack of due care in using it.[56] In some states, if the railroad has not provided a gate up to the standard required by statute, a failure by plaintiff to close the gate will not bar his recovery unless it is willfully done[57]

The general rule applies not only to the landowner but to any person using a gate in a railroad fence, whose animals are injured by reason of his own neglect to close it.[58] Plaintiff's failure to close it is not negligence contributing to the injury if, between the time of his failure to close it and the accident, others have used the gate and left it open,[59] but if, before he used the gate, someone else had passed through and left it open, that fact will not excuse his failure to close it after passing through himself.[60] Where herders driving cattle along a highway turned the cattle into a pasture along a railroad right of way without attempting to contact the owner of the pasture and without making sufficient examination to discover that a gate at a private crossing was open and that the fence on either side was broken, the herders were guilty of gross negligence, precluding recovery of damages for cattle killed by a train,[61] the position of the railroad track, of which the herders were fully advised, being of itself notice of danger, as regards the question whether they were guilty of contributory negligence.[62]

a. General rules
b. Near crossings, stations, and other places not required to be fenced
c. Effect of local stock laws

a. General Rules

(1) Where common-law rule adopted
(2) Where common-law rule not adopted

(1) Where Common-Law Rule Adopted

Where the common-law rule requiring owners to keep their animals on their own grounds is in force, it is ordinarily held that allowing stock to run at large is such contributory negligence as will preclude a recovery, although the rule is subject to some qualifications.

Where the common-law rule requiring owners to keep their animals on their own grounds is in force, it is ordinarily held that allowing stock to run at large is such negligence on the part of the owner as will preclude a recovery,[63] in the absence of wanton or willful injury or such gross negligence as is equivalent thereto on the part of the railroad company.[64] In some jurisdictions the rule is modified to the extent of holding that the mere fact that an animal is unlawfully at large does not, as between the owner and the railroad, constitute contributory negligence per se,[65] and that plaintiff will not be precluded from recovery unless the animal is allowed to run at large under such circumstances that the injury complained of was the natural and proximate result of so doing.[66] Where contributory negligence is not available as a defense under the fencing statutes, under the rules discussed supra § 619, the rule precluding recovery for animals allowed to be at large is not operative.[67]

(2) Where Common-Law Rule Not Adopted

Where the common-law rule requiring owners of animals to keep them on their own lands does not prevail, permitting them to run at large is not ordinarily contributory negligence, although they stray on a railroad track and are injured through the negligence of a railroad company, but recovery may be denied if cattle are allowed to run at large in extrahazardous places

Where the common-law rule requiring owners of animals to keep them on their own lands does not prevail, it is ordinarily held that the owner of stock in permitting them to run at large is not chargeable with contributory negligence if they stray on a railroad track and are injured through a want of ordinary care on the part of the railroad company.[68] The rule that the owner letting his stock run at large is not chargeable with contributory negligence applies as well to landowners living near the railroad as to those living in more remote localities,[69] and is not affected by the fact that the animal got at large through the owner's act,[70] even though he knew that cattle guards were defective[71] or that salt or other attracting substance was on the track.[72] Also the rule is not affected by the fact that, knowing that the animal was at large, he did not recapture and confine it.[73] A statute in terms providing that allowing stock to run at large on the common unfenced range or on inclosed land of the owner shall not be deemed to be contributory negligence has been held not to apply to stock not running loose but in charge of some person.[74] Even where animals are allowed at large, recovery is denied if cattle are allowed to run at large in extrahazardous places and ordinary care is not used to protect them,[75] or where the statute permitting owners to let their cattle go at large is construed as still requiring them to use care to keep them within reasonable confines, and such care is not used.[76] A statute providing that allowing stock to go at large may be set up as a defense does not apply to stock allowed the run of an inclosed pasture adjoining the track, but not permitted to go at large,[77] or to animals allowed to go at large within limits outside the statutory prohibition [78]

b. Near Crossings, Stations, and Other Places Not Required to Be Fenced

Although the rule has been modified in some jurisdictions, it is generally held to be contributory negligence for an owner of an animal to permit it to go at large near public crossings, station grounds, and other places where the railroad company is not required to fence its tracks.

Independently of the stock laws, or of whether or not the common-law rule as to animals running at large is followed, it is generally held to be contributory negligence for an owner of an animal to permit it to go at large near public crossings, station grounds, and other places where the railroad company is not required to fence its tracks.[79] A fortiori, wherever the common-law rule is in force, and it is held to be contributory negligence to permit stock to run at large anywhere, it is contributory negligence to permit stock to run at large at public crossings and other places which cannot be fenced under the law.[80] In some jurisdictions, however, where stock may lawfully run at large, it is held, in modification of the general rule, that it is not necessarily contributory negligence to allow animals to run at large even in the vicinity of station grounds and public crossings,[81] but that it is a question of whether plaintiff's conduct shows a want of ordinary care under the circumstances, which has contributed directly to the injury complained of [82]

c. Effect of Local Stock Laws

The rules existing in the various jurisdictions as to permitting animals to run at large, and as to contributory negligence in so doing, are not affected by municipal regulations or by state laws having a local application only which set up a different rule as to animals running at large.

The rules existing in the various jurisdictions as to permitting animals to run at large, and as to contributory negligence in so doing, are not affected by municipal regulations[83] or by state laws having a local application only which set up a different rule as to animals running at large [84] In jurisdictions following the common-law rule, allowing animals at large is still contributory negligence as a matter of law,[85] or as a question of fact,[86] notwithstanding a local rule permitting animals to go at large. In jurisdictions rejecting the common-law rule, allowing animals at large is not contributory negligence, notwithstanding a local rule restraining them [87] Independently of whether violation of a stock law is in itself contributory negligence, conduct of the owner of the stock in connection therewith will make it so when it contributes proximately to the injury.[88]

- d. Defects in fence around inclosure

a. In General

If animals escape from the owner's inclosure or control without any fault on his part, generally he is not chargeable with contributory negligence, but in some jurisdictions where the rule requiring owners to keep their animals on their own premises is in force, he cannot recover for injuries to them, even though they escaped without his fault, in the absence of gross negligence or intentional injury on the part of the railroad company.

It has been held in some cases, independently of the law as to animals running at large, that, if animals escape from the owner's inclosure or control without any fault on his part, he is not chargeable with contributory negligence.[89] Where it is lawful for stock to run at large, a failure to keep animals confined is not contributory negligence,[90] and neither is allowing animals to escape and making no effort to reclaim and confine them.[91] In jurisdictions where the common-law rule as to animals at large prevails, there is a conflict, some courts holding that an escape without the owner's fault will not preclude a recovery,[92] unless the owner knows that they have escaped and makes no effort to secure them;[93] other courts holding that the owner must see at his peril that the animals are kept on his own premises and that he cannot recover for injuries to them, even though they escaped without his fault,[94] in the absence of gross negligence or intentional injury on the part of the railroad company.[95]

A distinction has, however, been made between the escape of animals from the owner's inclosure and escape from his control when they were being driven along a highway,[96] it being held that, while the owner cannot recover in the former case,[97] unless the escape is due to the fault of the railroad,[98] he may in the latter case, if not at fault.[99] The fact that the escaped animals are injured on a public crossing does not change the law, a recovery being allowed if the escape is not due to plaintiff's fault in jurisdictions allowing recovery for injuries to animals on the track in such cases,[1] and denied in jurisdictions holding that the owner must keep his animals confined at his peril.[2]

b. Leaving Horses Unhitched or Unattended

Leaving horses unhitched or unattended in the immediate vicinity of a railroad track is ordinarily held to be contributory negligence, but the rule is otherwise if the horse is accustomed to be left in this way and is not afraid of trains.

To leave horses or teams unhitched or unattended in the immediate vicinity of a railroad track is ordinarily held to be such contributory negligence as will defeat a recovery, although the railroad company was negligent,[3] or its track was not fenced as required by law;[4] but it has been held that, where the horse is accustomed to be left in this way and is not afraid of trains, leaving him insecurely hitched is not contributory negligence as a matter of law.[5]

c. Effect of Stock Laws

Notwithstanding stock laws making it unlawful for stock to run at large, the owner is generally held not guilty of contributory negligence precluding recovery if without his knowledge or fault the stock escapes from his inclosure or control and is injured through the negligence of a railroad company.

Stock laws making it unlawful for stock to run at large do not impose an absolute requirement that the owner must keep stock on his own premises, but only require that his fences shall be reasonably sufficient to restrain it and that he shall exercise reasonable precautions to prevent its being at large,[6] and, if without the knowledge or fault of the owner the stock escapes from his inclosure or control, he is not chargeable with contributory negligence which will preclude a recovery where the railroad company has been negligent in the operation of its trains,[7] or has failed to fence its tracks as required by law,[8] or failed to keep its fences in repair or the gates therein closed,[9] the rule requiring only ordinary care from the owner, applying even where animals are breachy.[10] An owner whose animals have escaped without his fault cannot recover, however, against a railroad on the ground of its noncompliance with the fencing statute where as to those to whom the duty is owed the railroad has fully performed its duty to fence;[11] and it has been held that the owner of escaped cattle which has died from eating poisoned vegetation on the railroad right of way has no right to recover from the railroad company.[12]

d. Defects in Fence around Inclosure

If plaintiff's animals escape by reason of his failure to keep his fence in repair, and his neglect in this respect contributed to the injury, he cannot recover.

If plaintiff's animals escape from his inclosure by reason of his failure to keep his fence in repair and his neglect in this respect contributed to the injury complained of, he cannot recover;[14] but, if the animals had to break through other fences of other landowners before reaching the railroad track, the fact that plaintiff's fences were not in good repair is not sufficient to show such contributory negligence on his part as to defeat a recovery.[15] If there is a stock law in force and plaintiff puts animals in an inclosure, the fence of which is known to be insufficient, animals escaping therefrom are wrongfully at large and trespassers if they go on the railroad track.[16]

H. PROCEEDINGS FOR RECOVERY OF DAMAGES

1. In General

§ 627. Notice of Claim or Demand for Payment

a. In general
b. Form and sufficiency
c. Service or presentation

a. In General

Where required by statute a notice of the injury or demand for payment of the claim therefor must be made on the railroad company within a certain time after the injury is sustained or prior to the action to recover therefor.

Under some statutes a notice of the injury or demand for payment of the claim therefor must be made on the railroad company within a certain time after the injury is sustained[17] or prior to the action to recover therefor,[18] regardless of knowledge of the injury on the part of the company's officers or agents.[19] Under other statutes the claim or demand is not necessary if suit is commenced within the limit of time fixed by statute,[20] but the right to recover is barred if neither claim is made nor suit commenced within the statutory time.[21] Where by statute giving notice or beginning action by plaintiff is not required until the railroad has made report to a state board of inspection and notice to accept a proposed settlement or to arbitrate has been sent to the owner, if the railroad fails to act, it cannot later defend on the ground of failure of the owner to give notice or to start action within the statutory limit.[22]

The object of the statutes requiring a notice or demand is to inform the company of the injury and afford it an opportunity to investigate the circumstances and to settle the claim without litigation or prepare its defense.[23]

As condition precedent to action. Under some of the statutes, the notice or demand is a condition precedent to a right to maintain an action.[24] Under other statutes, it is a condition precedent to maintenance of an action under the statute, and the right to maintain a common-law action is not affected by a failure to give notice.[25] Under still other statutes it is merely a condition precedent to the right to recover double damages where the claim is not paid within a certain time after demand.[26]

Double damages and attorney's fees. Under some statutes, if the damages are not paid within a certain time after the notice or demand, plaintiff may recover double the actual damages sustained,[27] or reasonable attorney's fees,[28] or such attorney's fees together with a certain rate of interest on the amount of actual damages from the date of presentment of the claim,[29] or both double damages and attorney's fees,[30] and the validity of such provisions has been upheld.[31] Defendant cannot avoid liability for double damages on the ground that it had always been willing to settle the claim, unless an actual tender was made and refused or plaintiff was otherwise legally in fault for the nonpayment;[32] nor will an actual tender of less than the full amount of actual damage found by the jury affect the right of plaintiff to recover double damages.[33]

b. Form and Sufficiency

(1) In general
(2) Necessity and form of affidavit
(3) Amount of claim; excessive claim

(1) In General

In the absence of an express requirement in the statute that the notice or demand must be in writing, an oral demand is sufficient. The notice should as far as practicable inform the company of such material facts as will enable it to investigate the claim and decide on its course of action.

Where the statute requires it, the notice or demand must be in writing,[34] but in the absence of such express requirement an oral demand is sufficient.[35] Where the statute prescribes a form of notice requiring certain essential allegations, there must be a compliance with its provisions,[36] and if it requires the "time and place" of the injury to be stated the notice should do so with reasonable definiteness and certainty.[37] Although not required by the letter of the statute, the notice should as far as practicable inform the company of such material facts as will enable it to investigate the claim and decide on its course of action;[38] but ordinarily in the absence of express requirements the notice will be held good if reasonably sufficient to serve the purpose for which it is required to be given.[39] It is not necessary for claimant to specify the particular breach of duty on which plaintiff relies as fixing the liability.[40] Where issue is made on whether the demand served was a demand, it must be proved by offering in evidence the original demand if in writing, and secondary evidence is not admissible unless the nonproduction of the original is properly accounted for.[41]

Variance between notice and proof. Where defendant was not misled thereby, the right of recovery is not affected by a variance between the notice and the complaint or proof as to the description of the animal,[42] or the cause of injury,[43] or a slight inaccuracy in the designation of the company.[44]

(2) Necessity and Form of Affidavit

Where the statute requires it, the notice or demand must be accompanied by an affidavit of the injury, which may be embodied in the same paper with the notice, and need not contain anything more than the statement of the claim and the fact of injury.

Where the statute requires it, the notice or demand must be accompanied by an affidavit of the injury.[45] It need not be separate but may be embodied in the same paper with the notice,[46] but a copy of the affidavit instead of the original is not sufficient.[47] In the absence of express provision to the contrary the affidavit need not be made by plaintiff himself but may be made by some other person cognizant of the facts,[48] and need not contain anything more than the statement of the claim and the fact of injury.[49]

(3) Amount of Claim; Excessive Claim

Damages will be limited to the amount stated in the affidavit or to double that amount in case of double damages The making of an excessive claim may work a forfeiture of the right to double damages, but does not bar the right to recover actual damages.

Damages will be limited to the amount stated in the notice and affidavit[50] or to double that amount in the case of double damages[51] A notice or demand is not invalid because it states the value of the animal at more than it is actually worth,[52] but if the amount claimed in the notice or demand is clearly excessive, the notice or demand is null and void[53] However, where the statute requires that a notice or demand be served on the railroad company in order to entitle plaintiff to double damages, the effect of an excessive claim, when established, is to work a forfeiture of the right to double damages under the statute,[54] but not to bar plaintiff's right to recover actual damages independently of the statute.[55]

c. Service or Presentation

In the absence of express statutory provision to the contrary, it is not material by whom the notice is served or the claim presented, provided it is proper in form and within the time prescribed. The notice must be served on the person and in the manner designated by statute.

In the absence of express provision in the statute to the contrary, it is not material by whom the notice is served or the claim presented, provided it is in proper form and within the time prescribed.[56] The notice may be served by plaintiff himself,[57] or the claim may be stated to an employee of the railroad company and by him taken down and forwarded to the company.[58] Where the statute designates the officers or agents of the railroad on whom the notice or demand shall or may be served, the notice or demand must be shown to have been made on the designated officer or agent,[59] or on the person acting temporarily as such officer or agent with the sanction of the company.[60] However, a statute providing that demand "may" be made on any ticket or station agent is not mandatory,[61] and does not preclude a valid demand on a general officer of the company,[62] or on an agent expressly authorized to settle such claims;[63] but it is not sufficient where the only evidence is that the demand was made on a person representing himself as an agent of the company without showing what kind of an agent,[64] or without any further proof that he was in fact an agent of the company[65] Where the statute authorizes service on any officer, or station or ticket agent "employed in the management of the business of the corporation," it is sufficient where it is shown that service was made on a certain station agent without further proof that he was employed in the management of the business of the corporation.[66]

Manner and proof of service. The notice may, in the absence of express provision, be served simply by delivering the notice without reading it,[67] or by reading the original and delivering a copy,[68] or delivering the original;[69] but the affidavit accompanying the notice must be the original and not a copy.[70] Proof of service may be made by a copy of the notice served accompanied by the oath of the person who made the service,[71] or by an officer's indorsement on the notice or by affidavit,[72] or, it seems, by oral evidence upon the trial.[73]

a. In General

An appraisal of damages is a condition precedent to the maintenance of an action under some statutes, but it is not necessary where an action is brought at common law grounded on the defendant's negligence Under other statutes, it is not a condition precedent to the maintenance of an action under the statute, but merely to the recovery of attorney's fees.

An appraisal of damages is a condition precedent to the maintenance of an action under some statutes,[74] which, however, may be waived by the railroad,[75] and is waived by failure to object or to file a plea in abatement on the ground of its omission.[76] The appraisal is prima facie evidence of the damage[77] and places on the railroad a further liability for attorney's fees if it does not pay the owner the amount of the appraisal within a limit of time fixed by the statute.[78] However, even where appraisal is a condition precedent to recovery under the statute, it is not necessary where an action is brought at common law grounded on defendant's negligence[79]

Under other statutes, an appraisal is not a condition precedent to the maintenance of an action under the statute[80] but merely to the recovery of attorney's fees,[81] and under these statutes a defective appraisement, inadmissible in evidence for that reason, will not defeat plaintiff's recovery under the statute of the actual value of the animal killed minus attorney's fees where there is other evidence of the value independent of the appraisal.[82]

b. Mode of Appraisal

Notice of intention to apply for appointment of appraisers must be in writing, and must state when and where such application will be made It must be served by the plaintiff on the officer or agent designated in the statute by leaving with him a copy or the original.

Notice of intention to apply for appointment of appraisers must be in writing,[83] and must state when[84] and where[85] such application will be made An appointment of appraisers made at some place other than that designated is invalid[86] The notice must be served by plaintiff[87] on the officer or agent designated in the statute,[88] by leaving with him a copy or the original.[89]

Report of appraisers, in order to be admissible in evidence, must show that the proceedings before the appraisers have been in strict conformity with the statutory requirements.[90] It must show, for example, that the appraisers were disinterested householders of the county,[91] that they were sworn before undertaking the duties of their office,[92] and that they examined the stock killed or injured.[93]

§ 629. Summary Proceedings

Under some statutes where the damages claimed do not exceed a designated amount, a summary proceeding to recover for injuries to stock may be had on written notice to the railroad company.

Under some statutes, where the damages claimed do not exceed a designated amount, a summary proceeding to recover for injuries to stock may be had before a justice of the peace on written notice to the railroad company;[94] and double damages which bring the total claim to an amount in excess of the statutory limit may be recovered, but only by bringing a separate proceeding and on a different notice.[95] of statute, there is no duty owing from the railroad to the public, the remedy provided by the statute creating the duty is exclusive.

In a common-law action against a railroad company for injury to animals the proper form of action is an action on the case and not trespass,[96] or an action for damages for breach of contract if the railroad's duty to fence was imposed by agreement.[97] Where a railroad company which failed to fence its tracks as required by law, discussed supra § 560, negligently injures an animal, plaintiff may elect according to the facts of his case to base his action on the statute or on common-law grounds,[98] since an action at common law will lie for injuries to animals from defendant's failure to perform a statutory duty,[99] even in the absence of a prescribed remedy.[1] Likewise, where there are two statutes, one expressly requiring fencing at certain places and allowing double damages, and the other merely making the company liable for actual damages without proof of negligence where its road is not fenced, if the injury occurred at a place unfenced and within the application of the former statute, plaintiff may bring his action under either statute[2] or at common law.[3] Where in the absence of statute there is no duty owing from the railroad to the public, the remedy provided by a statute creating the duty is exclusive.[4] A statute prescribing a particular form of action before a justice but authorizing the action to be brought in a circuit court, without designating the form of action, does not require the same form of action in that court.[5]

§ 631. Defenses

It is no defense to an action for injury to an animal that it was abandoned and not turned over to the railroad company, or that the company acted in good faith in failing to fence its tracks, believing the locality in question to be depot grounds, or that it was prevented by the plaintiff from erecting a fence on his land outside the right of way.

It is no defense to an action for injury to an animal that it was abandoned and not turned over to the railroad company,[6] or that the company acted in good faith in failing to fence its tracks, believing the locality in question to be depot grounds,[7] or that it was prevented by plaintiff from erecting a fence on his land outside the right of way.[8]

Counterclaim. While there is some authority to the contrary,[9] the weight of authority favors the view that, in the absence of a statute providing otherwise, in an action against a railroad company for injury to animals the company cannot set up a counterclaim for damages to the train caused by the collision based on the wrongful presence of the animal on the track.[10]

§ 632. Jurisdiction and Venue

a. Jurisdiction
b. Venue

a. Jurisdiction

In the absence of a statute providing otherwise, actions for injuries to animals may be maintained in any court which has jurisdiction of the subject matter of the action and can obtain jurisdiction of the parties. Under some statutes jurisdiction is determined by the amount of the claim.

In the absence of a statute providing otherwise, actions for injuries to animals may be maintained in any court which has jurisdiction of the subject matter of the action and can obtain jurisdiction of the parties,[11] and a statutory action which is maintainable only by an adjoining landowner may be brought in a court not having jurisdiction of actions involving title to land.[12] Where the statutes so provide, jurisdiction is determined by the amount of the claim, justices of the peace having exclusive jurisdiction of claims not exceeding a certain amount,[13] and the county courts having jurisdiction of claims exceeding that amount.[14] Where animals are killed at different times, the causes of action are separate and distinct, and if separately they are within the exclusive jurisdiction of a justice of the peace they cannot be combined so as to give a higher court jurisdiction.[15]

b. Venue

In the absence of a statutory provision to the contrary, an action against a railroad company for injury to animals may be brought in any county through which the road runs or wherever jurisdiction may be had of the defendant company.

In the absence of a statutory provision to the contrary, an action against a railroad company for injury to animals is transitory,[16] and may be brought in any county through which the road runs[17] or wherever jurisdiction may be had of defendant company,[18] and this is the rule in some states by virtue of the express provisions of the statute.[19] However, where the statute requires it, the action must be brought in the county where the injury occurred,[20] subject to such restrictions as the statute contains relating to the animal injured,[21] and the steps to be taken by the railroad for adjustment of the loss.[22] In some jurisdictions, an action based on the statutory liability for failure to fence must be brought in the county where the injury occurred, while an action on the common-law liability for negligence may be brought in any county through which the road runs.[23] Provisions governing venue in "actions of trespass" against a railroad have been held applicable to this class of cases, although technically they are actions of trespass on the case.[24]

Before justice of peace. Where the action may be brought before a justice of the peace it must, where the statute so provides, be brought in the township in which the injury occurred[25] or in an adjoining township,[26] if in the same county.[27] In the absence of such express requirement, the action may be brought before a justice of any township within the county where the injury occurred.[28] If the injury occurred in another state, since the action is transitory it may be brought before a justice of the peace,[29] subject only to the statutory limitation as to amount.[30]

§ 633. Time to Sue and Limitations

In some jurisdictions there are special statutes of limitation for actions against railroad companies for injuries to animals, and actions not commenced until after the expiration of the statutory period are barred, except where the statutory provision for filing a claim within the statutory period as an alternative has been complied with.

In some jurisdictions there are special statutes of limitation for actions against railroad companies for injuries to animals,[31] and actions not commenced until after the expiration of the statutory period are barred,[32] except where the statutory provision for filing a claim within the statutory period as an alternative has been complied with.[33] However, some special statutory limitations are held to apply only to actions to recover for injuries caused by actual contact or collision with trains.[34] The special limitations statute does not bar the bringing of an action under the statute where the railroad is in default for failure to comply with its duty under the statute to secure an appraisal and notify the owner, as discussed supra § 627; nor does the statute have any application to an action to recover for injuries to animals based, not on the statute, but on the common-law ground of negligence.[35]

Limitations in charter. The defense that the action is barred by limitation is available to a railroad where the provision therefor is contained in its charter,[36] and such a limitation on the railroad's liability is within the power of the legislature to create,[37] and to amend or repeal.[38] However, the charter limitation is not repealed by a subsequent general revision of the statutes excepting from its repealing provision the "powers, privileges and franchises of any corporation,"[39] or by a subsequent statute providing for a recovery of an additional sum if an assessed valuation is not paid within a stated time, since such provision is cumulative.[40] Where a railroad has been operated by several companies in succession, the availability of the defense of limitations to the last in succession will presumably be determined by the charter provisions of the company which constructed the road, in the absence of controlling evidence to the contrary.[41]

§ 634. Parties and Process

a. Parties
b. Process

a. Parties

A person, although not the absolute owner of an animal, may have a special property therein which will entitle him to sue for its injury by a railroad company, without making the real owner a party.

A person, although not the absolute owner of an animal, may have a special property therein which will entitle him to sue for its injury by a railroad company,[42] without making the real owner a party.[43] In an action to subject a railroad operated by a lessee to seizure and sale to satisfy a judgment for damages for injury to animals, both the lessor and lessee, having interests to be affected by the sale, should be made parties defendant.[44]

Actions for double damages. An action for injury to an animal brought under a statute allowing plaintiff to recover double damages where the road is not fenced is not an action for a penalty which must be brought in the name of the state, but is properly brought in the name of the owner of the animal.[45]

b. Process

In the absence of a statute specially providing for service of process on a railroad in actions to recover for injuries to animals, the general rules or statutes governing service of process on railroads apply.

In some jurisdictions special statutes have been enacted providing for service of process on a railroad in actions to recover for injuries to animals.[46] Under such statutes service on the company may be made by copy on any conductor of any train passing through the county where the animal was killed,[47] but the statute is not exclusive, and service may be made on any other officer or agent of the company properly served under general law.[48] Service on the conductor is sufficient against the railroad, even though the conductor is employed and controlled by the receiver of the road,[49] but will not authorize a judgment, where there is no appearance, against an individual operating the road as a lessee.[50] A return is sufficient which states that service was made on a certain conductor without stating that he was conductor of a train passing through the county,[51] or which states that it was served on defendant by handing a copy to the station agent at a certain station without stating that he was an agent of defendant.[52] The fact that the summons describes the animal as the property of plaintiff is immaterial if he was in the actual and exclusive possession thereof and entitled to maintain the action.[53]

In the absence of statute specially providing for service of process on a railroad in actions to recover for injuries to animals, the general rules or statutes governing service of process on railroads apply.[54]

a. In General

General rules govern as to the necessity and sufficiency of allegations in the declaration, complaint, or petition, in actions for injuries to animals by railroad companies.

General rules govern as to the necessity and sufficiency of allegations in the declaration, complaint, or petition, in actions for injuries to animals by railroad companies.[55] Where the action is based on a statute of another state, the statute must be pleaded.[56]

Separate causes of action for injuries to animals at different times may be joined in the same complaint,[57] but each injury should be stated in a separate paragraph,[58] although allegations applicable to the different counts need not be repeated in each but may be stated with respect to such counts.[59]

b. Negligence or Tortious Act

(1) In general
(2) Sufficiency of allegations in general
(3) Where action may be either at common law or under statute

(1) In General

In accordance with general rules an owner seeking recovery for injuries to his animal must first allege the tortious act of the defendant or its agents or employees, and if the action is at common law, he must allege negligence on the part of the defendant.

In accordance with general rules, an owner seeking recovery for injuries to his animal must first allege the tortious act to be the act of defendant or its agents or employees,[60] and, if the action is at common law, he must allege negligence on the part of defendant,[61] and that the alleged negligence was the proximate cause of the injury;[62] but he need not allege defendant's breach of its statutory duty where it is not a part of the negligence relied on,[63] although a breach of a statutory duty may be made the basis of an action at common law by including in the declaration an averment of the railroad's negligence, as discussed infra subdivision i of this section. A statutory provision requiring the keeping of records of animals killed and penalizing a delinquent railroad by an award of double damages does not make an allegation of negligence any the less necessary.[64] Where the statute makes proof of the injury prima facie evidence of negligence and places the burden of proof on defendant in some,[65] but not other, jurisdictions,

Order overruling motion to quash held erroneous

Where railroad's special appearance and motion to quash summons for lack of proper service had attached to it an affidavit of party served denying that he was resident of county in which suit was brought, denying that he was local superintendent of repairs of the railroad, and denying that he had charge or custody of any station or place of business of the railroad in the county, and stating that at the time purported summons was served, he was not within the county, and the affidavit was not controverted, order overruling motion to quash was erroneous and judgment based on the service attacked was required to be vacated.—Kansas, Oklahoma & Gulf Ry. plaintiff must still allege negligence in his complaint

Proximate cause. The complaint need not allege in express terms that defendant's negligence was the proximate cause of the injury, if it alleges that the injury occurred by reason of the negligence of defendant in the manner specified,[66] nor need it in express terms allege facts in the chain of causation necessarily implied from other facts which are stated.[67] A statement of facts of the nature of res gestæ is properly a part of the declaration even though no causal connection between them and the injury is alleged or proved.[68]

(2) Sufficiency of Allegations in General

A general allegation of negligence in the operation of trains is usually sufficient without setting forth the specific acts constituting such negligence.

Although there is some authority to the contrary,[69] in most jurisdictions it is held that a general allegation of negligence in the operation of trains is sufficient without setting forth the specific acts constituting such negligence,[70] although the facts giving rise to the duty owed by the railroad to plaintiff, the railroad's breach of that duty, and the resulting injury and damage to plaintiff must be alleged.[71] Plaintiff may, if he chooses, set out and describe the particular acts complained of and then allege that they were negligently done,[72] but, as discussed infra § 638, by stating specific acts of negligence he will be confined in his evidence and right of recovery to the issues thus tendered.

(3) Where Action May Be Either at Common Law or under Statute

Where an action may be maintained either at common law or under statute, the complaint must allege either negligence or facts making such allegations unnecessary.

The complaint must allege either negligence or facts making such allegations unnecessary,[73] and where it alleges neither negligence nor a failure to fence, it does not state a cause of action either at common law or under the statute;[74] and, if the company is not required to fence, a complaint alleging only a failure to fence, and not alleging any negligence in the operation of the train by which the animal was killed or injured, does not state a cause of action.[75] The complaint should be so worded that it can be ascertained therefrom whether plaintiff's cause of action is founded on defendant's negligence in the operation of its trains or on the statutory liability for failure to fence;[76] but, since there is no inconsistency, plaintiff may allege in the same complaint both negligence and a failure to fence, and, if the facts warrant it, may recover on either ground,[77] without being compelled to elect on which theory he will proceed,[78] subject, however, to the qualification that, if the statute limits the liability of the railroad in such cases, the bringing of a common-law action will not have the effect of extending that liability beyond the statutory limit in a case where, in the absence of statute, there would be no liability whatever.[79] Where the complaint contains allegations both of negligence and a failure to fence, but the allegations are not sufficient as to one of these grounds, plaintiff may still recover if the allegations constitute a good statement of a cause of action either at common law[80] or under the statute,[81] and the other allegations may be stricken or disregarded as surplusage.[82]

c. Acts or Omissions of Agents or Employees

In order to render a railroad company liable for injuries to animals done by an employee, the complaint must allege that such employee was acting in the line of his employment or under the direction of the company.

In accordance with the general rule, discussed in Master and Servant § 614, in order to render a railroad company liable for injuries to animals done by an employee, the complaint must allege that such employee was acting in the line of his employment or under the direction of the company,[83] but it need not be directly alleged if it is inferable from other facts well pleaded.[84] It is not necessary to allege the names[85] or positions[86] of the employees in charge of the train by which the animal was injured. However, where the action is brought against both the railroad and the negligent employee, the complaint is insufficient against the latter if it fails to state the nature of his employment or that he was present at the time of the injury complained of.[87]

d. Willful or Intentional Injury

A complaint states a good cause of action if the facts alleged show that the injury was purposely and intentionally inflicted, or if it alleges without setting out the facts connected with the injury that the injurious act was purposely done with intent to inflict the injury complained of.

In compliance with the general rule, discussed in Negligence § 190, a complaint states a good cause of action if the facts alleged show that the injury was purposely and intentionally inflicted,[88] or if it alleges without setting out the facts connected with the injury that the injurious act was purposely done with intent to inflict the injury complained of,[89] and the term "willful" is sufficient to characterize the act in connection with which it is used as intentionally and tortiously done.[90] However, where the averment of willfulness is supplemented by other allegations that the train was run "without seeing or endeavoring to see" the animals before injuring them, the complaint is converted into one based on negligence and is insufficient to charge a willful injury.[91] Where the complaint is based on a violation of the statutory duty to fence, and the only allegations of negligence and willfulness relate to the question of fencing and not to the management of the train, they may be disregarded as surplusage.[92] Where, as discussed supra § 550, an owner can recover for injuries to animals trespassing on the track only by showing wantonness in the operation of the train, a declaration which charges merely negligence in operation of the train in such case is demurrable.[93]

e. Time and Place of Injury

The rule generally adopted is that allegations of the time and place of the injury are necessary both in actions at common law and under the statute, and should state the time and place of the injury to the animals with as much definiteness and certainty as possible.

The rule generally adopted is that allegations of the time and place of the injury are necessary both in actions at common law and under the statute,[94] although in some jurisdictions, where the statute requires such allegations, it is held that the requirement is restricted to the statutory actions to recover for injuries to animals from collisions with trains.[95] The allegations, when required, should state the time and place of the injury with as much definiteness and certainty as possible[96] to the end that defendant may be enabled to prepare its defense[97] and avoid the necessity of subpoenaing an unnecessary number of witnesses.[98] Allegations have been held insufficient which state merely the month[99] or year,[1] or which do not state the date[2] or the county.[3] However, a complaint has been held reasonably definite and certain which alleges the day[4] and a place on the track related to some known point, as a city[5] or a public crossing.[6]

An allegation of the fact that the injury was incurred in a particular county has been held sufficient,[7] but where a statute expressly requires that the complaint shall specify the time and place of the injury, it has been held not to be sufficient merely to state the county[8] or city near or through which the railroad ran,[9] although statements that the injury was suffered "on or about" a certain day,[10] and near,[11] or an approximate distance[12] or a stated direction[13] from a certain station have been held to be sufficient allegations, and matter descriptive of the locality will not be stricken on motion.[14] If the action is based on a statute of the state where it is instituted the complaint must show that the railroad is located within that state.[15]

Where the statutes expressly restrict the venue according to the county or township where the injury occurred, as discussed supra § 632 b, such facts are jurisdictional,[16] and the complaint must allege in conformity with such provisions that the injury occurred in the county in which the action is brought,[17] or in the township,[18] or either in that or an adjoining township;[19] but a township allegation is not required where, under the statute, the action may be brought before any justice in the county.[20] It is not necessary that the county or township allegations for jurisdictional purposes should be made in express terms, it being sufficient if it appears by necessary implication from the averments of the complaint that the injury occurred in such county[21] or township.[22]

f. Nature and Extent of Injury or Damage

Where the plaintiff only seeks to recover for the damages naturally resulting from negligent acts general in their nature, such as failure to fence, the particulars in respect of which the plaintiff has been damaged need not be stated; but in order to recover for damages resulting from particular negligent acts, such as running over an animal, an allegation of special damage for which recovery is sought is necessary.

Where plaintiff only seeks to recover for the damages naturally resulting from negligent acts general in their nature, such as failure to fence, the particulars in respect of which plaintiff has been damaged need not be stated;[23] but in order to recover for damages resulting from particular negligent acts, such as running over an animal, an allegation of the special damage for which recovery is sought is necessary.[24] Plaintiff need not allege that the injured animal was a chattel of value.[25] A complaint is sufficient which alleges that plaintiff's animal was "killed or disabled" without showing which,[26] or which alleges that the animal was killed and was of a certain value without a direct allegation that the injury was to plaintiff's damage,[27] or which alleges that the animal was killed and that plaintiff was damaged in a specified sum without directly alleging the value,[28] or which states the number and character of the animals killed and their value,[29] or which states their average value without stating the value of each animal separately.[30] When the statute allows plaintiff to recover a reasonable attorney's fee it is not necessary to allege that the employment of an attorney in the case was necessary.[31] Since the action is in tort it is not necessary to allege that plaintiff's claim is due and unpaid,[32] nor may defendant demand a bill of particulars.[33]

g. Ownership of Animal Injured

The complaint must allege the plaintiff's ownership of the animal injured.

The complaint must allege plaintiff's ownership of the animal injured,[34] but not specifically the character of the ownership.[35]

h. Ownership, Direction, and Kind of Train

The declaration, complaint, or petition must allege that the train by which the animal was injured belonged to the defendant or was being operated over its road and should state with as much definiteness and certainty as possible the direction and kind of train.

Following the general rule of pleading in negligence cases, discussed in Negligence § 184, the declaration, complaint, or petition must allege that the train by which the animal was injured belonged to defendant or was being operated over its road,[36] but it need not name the particular train which did the damage,[37] although some courts have held that defendant is entitled to this information from plaintiff.[38]

Plaintiff should state with as much definiteness and certainty as possible the direction,[39] and kind of train,[40] in order to enable defendant to prepare its defense,[41] and avoid the necessity of subpoenaing an unnecessary number of witnesses[42]

i. In Actions Based on Failure to Construct or Maintain Fences and Cattle Guards

(1) In general
(2) Under contract
(3) Cause of injury
(4) Lapse of time for construction
(5) Places of entry and injury
(6) Defects in fences and cattle guards

(1) In General

In actions based on the statutory liability of a railroad company for failure to fence its tracks no allegation of negligence is necessary, but the complaint must allege facts sufficient to bring the case within the terms of the statute.

In actions based on the statutory liability of a railroad company for failure to fence its tracks no allegation of negligence is necessary,[43] except where the animal was injured at a place not required to be fenced,[44] or where the action is brought in a court which can have jurisdiction of it only as an action at common law.[45] Where the action is brought before a court having jurisdiction of it as an action under the statute, the complaint must allege facts sufficient to bring the case within its terms,[46] subject to the qualification applicable to pleading generally, discussed in Pleading § 54, favoring a strict[47] or liberal[48] construction of the averments in particular cases. Accordingly, a declaration in an action under the statute must allege the facts from which the duty of the railroad to fence arises,[49] that defendant did not fence;[50] that the animal got on the track at a point where the railroad was required by the statute to erect and maintain fences, as discussed infra subdivision i (5) of this section; that the injury resulted from the railroad's failure to fence, and from actual collision with the train in states where the operation of the statute is so restricted, as discussed infra subdivision i (3) of this section; and that plaintiff owned or was in possession of land through which the railroad runs,[51] or had permission to pasture his animals therein,[52] or that his animals had strayed thereon without his fault,[53] although allegations of straying without the owner's fault have been held not necessary before a justice of the peace,[54] or where lands are unenclosed[55]

It is not necessary for the complaint to set out or define what constitutes a lawful fence within the application of the statute,[56] or to state in what particular respect the fence in question was unlawful.[57] Ordinarily it is sufficient if the complaint follows the language of the statute,[58] but it is not necessary that the declaration should expressly refer to the statute, if the facts alleged show a liability thereunder,[59] or that allegations should be in the exact words of the statute if words of equivalent import and meaning are used,[60] or that facts should be alleged in express terms if they are necessarily or reasonably to be implied from facts stated.[61]

Negativing exceptions. The complaint must negative any exceptions as to the liability of the railroad contained in the enacting clause of the statute,[62] but it need not negative exceptions in other parts of the statute,[63] or in a subsequent statute,[64] or which are not expressly contained in the statute but might exist from the fact that the road could not lawfully or properly be fenced at certain places.[65] It is not necessary that exceptions in the enacting clause should be specifically negatived if the facts alleged clearly do so by inference[66]

(2) Under Contract

Where the plaintiff relies on a failure of the railroad company to fence its tracks according to contract, that fact and the fact that the breach of the contract was the cause of the animal's injuries, should be alleged in the complaint.

Where plaintiff relies on a failure of the railroad company to fence its tracks according to contract that fact[67] and the fact that the breach of the contract was the cause of the animal's injuries[68] should be alleged in the complaint; but it is not necessary that the contract or a copy thereof,[69] or that the deed of the right of way to the railroad embodying its terms,[70] should be filed with the pleading. Likewise, it is not necessary that the complaint should state when the contract was first broken[71] In an action for failure on the part of a railroad to maintain fences already constructed by its predecessor under a written contract to construct and maintain them, it is not necessary that the complaint should allege that defendant had knowledge of such contract.[72] Where the contract relied on was made between the railroad and some one other than plaintiff, plaintiff must allege his title and right to sue thereunder.[73] Where the statute relieves the railroad from liability where the landowner has agreed to maintain the fence or received pay for so doing when the right of way was acquired, it is not necessary to negative these exceptions if they are not contained in the enacting clause of the statute[74]

(3) Cause of Injury

Where the statute provides that the company shall be liable for damages caused or occasioned by, or which may result from, the failure to fence, the complaint must allege or show that the injury was so caused.

Where the statute provides that the company shall be liable for damages caused or occasioned by, or which may result from, the failure to fence, the complaint must allege or show that the injury was so caused;[75] but it is not necessary to employ the exact term used in the statute,[76] or that it should be in the form of an express allegation,[77] it being sufficient if it appears by necessary or reasonable implication from the facts stated;[78] and, in the absence of such a provision in the statute, an allegation to this effect is not necessary.[79] If action is brought under a statute construed as authorizing a recovery for failure to fence only where injury is caused by collision of an animal with the train, the complaint must allege that the injury was caused by collision.[80]

(4) Lapse of Time for Construction

As a general rule, where the statute allows a certain time after the road or a part thereof is completed or put in operation within which the fence required may be constructed, the complaint must state that such time had elapsed at the time of the injury alleged.

Although there is some authority to the contrary,[81] the general rule is that, where the statute allows a certain time after the road or a part thereof is completed or put in operation within which the fence required may be constructed, the complaint must allege that such time had elapsed at the time of the injury complained of,[82] and such allegation must be made with express reference to the place where the animal came on the track.[83]

(5) Places of Entry and Injury

Although generally in an action under a fencing statute to recover for injuries to an animal, an allegation that the track was not fenced at the place where the animal entered on it is necessary, under some statutes such an allegation is not necessary and an allegation that the track was not fenced at the place where the animal was injured is sufficient.

In an action under a fencing statute to recover for injuries to an animal, an allegation that the track was not fenced at the place where the animal came on it is necessary;[84] but it need not be alleged directly if the fact appears by necessary inference from the other allegations.[85] It is not necessary that the complaint should allege that the track was not fenced at the place where the animal was injured,[86] nor is such an allegation alone, if made, sufficient,[87] except where it may be reasonably inferred from the allegations that the animal entered at the place where it was injured,[88] and except, as held in some states, where the action is before a justice of the peace.[89] However, under some statutes making railroad companies liable for killing or injuring livestock on an unfenced track, it is not necessary to allege the point at which the animal entered on the track of the railroad,[90] except where the animal is struck at a point where the railroad is not required to fence,[91] such as a public highway.[92] Thus, under such statutes, it has been held that an allegation that the track was not fenced at the place where the animal was injured is sufficient,[93] and it will be presumed, as discussed infra § 642, that the animal entered at the point where it was injured.

Where the statute expressly requires the road to be fenced at certain designated places, as discussed supra §§ 569–574, it is not necessary that plaintiff allege the exact place of entry,[94] but it is necessary for him to allege sufficient facts to bring himself within the provisions of the statute.[95] Accordingly, the complaint must show either by direct allegation or necessary implication that the place of entry was one which the statute required to be fenced;[96] and this may be done either by an affirmative allegation expressly designating the place as one within the provisions of the statute,[97] or by negativing that it was at any of the places, specifying them, which are not within its application;[98] but it is not sufficient if it omits the necessary affirmative allegation and does not negative all of the places not included[99]

If the statute expressly excepts certain places, the complaint must show that the place of entry was not within the exception;[1] but the allegation need not be in express terms if this fact sufficiently appears from the facts stated,[2] or in strictly accurate terms if the inaccuracy is shown not to have prejudiced the rights of the railroad.[3] It is only as to the place of entry that the rule as to stating exceptions applies, and it is not necessary to allege that the place of injury was not one of the places not required to be fenced.[4] If the statute does not contain any express exception but merely makes the company liable without regard to negligence for all damages to stock where its road is not fenced, it is sufficient merely to allege that the animal came on the track where the road was not fenced and was injured without alleging that the place was one which should have been fenced,[5] and if the place was in fact one which the company could not lawfully or properly have fenced, such as a public crossing or depot grounds, this is a matter of defense which need not be negatived in the complaint.[6] If the action is at common law and failure to erect and maintain fences is alleged as the negligence relied on, it is not necessary to allege further as to the duty of the railroad to fence at particular places.[7]

(6) Defects in Fences and Cattle Guards

In an action for injuries due to defects in fences and cattle guards, a complaint is sufficient which alleges that the stock gap or cattle guard was dangerous and was so constructed as to be inviting to ordinary stock, or that the injury was due to a failure to maintain a good and sufficient fence, or that the road was not securely fenced.

In an action for injuries due to defects in fences and cattle guards, a complaint is sufficient which alleges that the stock gap or cattle guard was dangerous and was so constructed as to be inviting to ordinary stock,[8] or that the injury was due to a failure to maintain a good and sufficient fence,[9] or that the road was not securely fenced,[10] without any more specific reference to the particular defect,[11] or which alleges circumstances from which the necessary implication is that the railroad fence was not properly maintained[12] and that the injury complained of was occasioned thereby.[13] The complaint need not allege that plaintiff had not agreed to maintain the fence or received pay for so doing,[14] or that the defect had been permitted to exist for an unnecessary length of time[15] Where, however, a railroad is only required to put in cattle guards at particular places, a complaint based on a failure to keep a cattle guard in repair must allege that it was one which it was the duty of defendant to maintain,[16] or which was located at one of the places where the statute required it to be maintained.[17]

Place of entry unknown

In action against railroad to recover for loss of cattle killed on right of way, which action was based on failure to fence right of way as required by statute where right of way passes through lands privately owned and improved, plaintiff's allegation that cattle entered onto the track at a place to plaintiff unknown, was insufficient to show violation of statutory duty, since railroad need not fence right of way where it does not pass through privately owned and improved lands—Wilde v Union Pac R. j. Negativing Contributory Negligence

Although where the action is founded on negligence, the authorities are in conflict as to the necessity of negativing contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff, an allegation negativing contributory negligence is not necessary where the action is based on the statutory liability for failure on the part of the railroad to fence its tracks, or on breach of its agreement to fence, or where it is alleged that the injury was willfully inflicted.

Following the general rule of the particular jurisdiction, as discussed in Negligence § 194, in some jurisdictions, where the action is founded on negligence, it is not necessary for the complaint to negative contributory negligence on the part of plaintiff,[18] in the absence of allegations from which it can be inferred that the injuries were due to the inherent viciousness of the animal or to failure of the owner to exercise due care under the circumstances;[19] but in other jurisdictions it is necessary to negative contributory negligence,[20] even where the action originated before a justice of the peace.[21] An allegation negativing contributory negligence has been held not necessary where the action is based on the statutory liability for failure on the part of the railroad to fence its tracks,[22] or on breach of its agreement to fence,[23] or where it is alleged that the injury was willfully inflicted.[24]

k. Amendment

The complaint, if defective, may be amended if the amendment does not change or introduce a different cause of action, and this rule has been applied to the allowance of amendments in a court of general jurisdiction on appeal from an action originally brought before a justice of the peace.

General rules govern amendments of declarations or complaints in actions against railroad companies for injuries to animals.[25] Accordingly, the complaint, if defective, may be amended if the amendment does not change or introduce a different cause of action,[26] and is no more than a particularization of the more general allegations of the original statement.[27] Where the action is originally brought before a justice, such amendment may be made on appeal in a court of general jurisdiction,[28] but no new item or cause of action not embraced or intended to be included in the original statement shall be added by the amendment.[29] Thus a common-law action for negligence cannot be changed by amendment to a statutory action for damages[30] or double damages.[31]

Offer of compromise by defendant. In an action to recover for death of an animal, it has been held proper to allow an amendment of the petition by allegations setting up offer of compromise by defendant, plaintiff's acceptance thereof, and defendant's refusal to comply therewith, which required plaintiff to file suit seeking recovery.[32]

§ 636. Plea or Answer

The general rules of pleading in civil actions apply to pleas and answers in actions against railroad companies for injuries to animals.

The general rules of pleading in civil actions, discussed in Pleading §§ 103–109, and particularly those applicable to actions based on negligence, considered in Negligence §§ 196–198, apply to pleas and answers in actions against railroad companies for injuries to animals.[33] Accordingly, the answer must be framed with such clearness and certainty as to show whether defendant intends to deny the complaint or to confess and avoid it.[34] A plea which merely contains a narrative of how the accident happened but does not expressly or by necessary implication from the facts stated deny that defendant's acts were negligent or were the proximate cause of the injuries,[35] or affirm plaintiff's negligence and that it was the proximate cause of the injuries,[36] is not sufficient. An answer that plaintiff is not the owner of the animal is good as against a general demurrer when the action is brought under a statute allowing recovery to the person having the general or special property in such animal.[37] An answer alleging that plaintiff was a servant of defendant whose duty it was to keep animals off the track must allege that such duty applied to the place where the animal in question came on it.[38]

Plea of avoidance must allege facts and not merely matters of evidence.[39]

Answer relying on compliance with fencing law must allege that the statutory procedural steps were taken and that the fence was constructed and was being maintained in compliance therewith.[40]

Special agreements with, or acquiescence of, landowner, as relieving defendant of obligation to maintain gates at private crossings, must be specially pleaded.[41]

Where complaint in separate paragraphs alleges different grounds of liability, an answer which assumes to answer the entire complaint is bad if it contains nothing which would constitute a defense to one of the grounds of liability charged.[42]

Contributory negligence. General rules apply to answers or pleas setting up the defense of contributory negligence.[43] Accordingly, the defense of contributory negligence is not raised by an answer which fails to identify the animals referred to therein as the animals injured,[44] or which assumes to characterize as contributory negligence an act of plaintiff which, as stated, is not negligence,[45] or which may or may not have been negligent when measured by the legal standard of reasonable care under the circumstances.[46] If the answer alleges that the injury was due to the gross negligence of plaintiff himself, it must state in what such gross negligence consisted;[47] and if it alleges that plaintiff negligently turned his animal out in the vicinity of a station, it must further allege that the animal went on the track at such place where it was not the duty of the company to fence.[48]

Counterclaim. Where defendant denies plaintiff's allegation of negligence and sets up a counterclaim for injury to the train, it is not necessary affirmatively to allege that defendant was free from all fault or negligence,[49] and a statement of facts from which plaintiff's negligence and defendant's freedom from negligence are inferable is sufficient.[50]

§ 637. Replication or Reply

General rules govern replications and replies in actions against railroad companies for injuries to animals.

General rules discussed in Pleading §§ 184-206 and Negligence § 199, govern replications and replies in actions against railroad companies for injuries to animals.[51] A replication alleging insufficiency of a cattle guard must allege its insufficiency to turn cattle generally,[52] not merely its insufficiency to turn the particular animal which was injured.[53] Matters of defense cannot be held to be admitted in a reply in the face of the denial contained therein,[54] even though the denial is qualified by an exception where it is possible to construe the exception as not having that effect.[55]

§ 638. Issues, Proof, and Variance

b. Matters to be proved

d. Variance

a. In General

In actions against railroad companies for injuries to animals, only such matters may be adjudicated or made a basis of recovery as are put in issue by the pleadings.

In actions against railroad companies for injuries to animals, only such matters may be adjudicated or made a basis of recovery as are put in issue by the pleadings,[56] and, while an immaterial variance between the allegations and the proof may be disregarded, as discussed infra subdivision d of this section, plaintiff cannot state a particular cause of action and recover on an entirely different ground of liability,[57] or set out particular acts of negligence and recover on proof of negligence in respects other than those alleged.[58] Thus, where the complaint charges only a willful and intentional injury, plaintiff cannot, without further pleadings, recover on the ground of negligence;[59] or if the complaint alleges only a failure to fence, plaintiff cannot recover on the ground of negligence in the operation of the train,[60] or in the manner of constructing a bridge or trestle on which an animal is injured,[61] or on the ground of negligence in allowing a gate in the fence to be open;[62] but, where the evidence as to a gate being left open is admitted without objection and the question is treated by both parties as an essential issue under the pleadings, plaintiff may recover on that ground.[63] If the complaint alleges only a failure to construct cattle guards, plaintiff cannot recover on the ground of a failure to fence,[64] but, where the statute requires the maintenance of both fences and cattle guards, a complaint alleging a failure as to both states but a single cause of action, and proof of either with proof of the other necessary allegations will entitle plaintiff to recover.[65]

Where there are two fencing statutes, one expressly requiring fencing at certain places and allowing double damages for injuries due to the failure to comply, and the other merely making the company liable for actual damages without proof of negligence where its track is not fenced, if the action is based on the former statute and the place unfenced is not within the application of that statute, there can be no recovery under the latter;[66] but, if it does not clearly appear that the action is based on the former statute, the mere fact that the complaint prays for double damages will not prevent the recovery of actual damages if it states a good cause of action under the latter statute,[67] or at common law,[68] and, if an animal is killed in a town or city at a place where the railroad has not but might lawfully have fenced, plaintiff cannot sue under the former statute, but must bring his action under the latter statute or at common law.[69]

An allegation of negligence generally raises the issue of the engineer's care in keeping a lookout as the train approached a public crossing as well as his observance of his duty under the statute to give warnings.[70] However, an allegation of failure to give statutory warnings at a particular crossing raises no issue of a similar failure at other crossings.[71] Plaintiff is, however, entitled to go to the jury on every act of negligence alleged in his complaint and denied by the answer in so far at least as evidence has been produced tending to sustain them.[72] The issue of defendant's ownership or operation of the railroad at the time of the accident is not raised by an answer admitting defendant "is now operating" the road, and not denying ownership or operation at the time of the accident.[73]

b. Matters to Be Proved

The plaintiff, in order to recover, must prove each and every allegation of the complaint which is not admitted and which is necessary to establish the cause of action alleged

Plaintiff, in order to recover, must prove each and every allegation of the complaint which is not admitted and which is necessary to establish the cause of action alleged,[74] but not an allegation which is mere surplusage and not essential to his case.[75] Since the allegation of plaintiff's ownership of the injured stock is a necessary one, as discussed supra § 635 g, it must be supported by proof.[76] There must be proof of defendant's operation of the train at the time of the accident to support an allegation of negligent operation of cars,[77] of negligence to support a charge of negligent killing,[78] but not of actual participation by defendant company, since proof of negligence of its employees is sufficient.[79] An allegation as to the place of injury, if not a material part of the cause of action, being made merely to locate where the injury occurred, need not be proved strictly as alleged.[80] In a common-law action the allegation of negligence is material and must be proved.[81] Where the complaint alleges several negligent acts, any one of which would be sufficient ground for recovery, proof in support of one of the stated grounds is all that is required for a recovery.[82]

In an action under the statute plaintiff must prove the allegation that the road was not fenced,[83] and such other allegations as are necessary to bring the case within the provisions of the particular statute sued on,[84] such as that the place was one which the statute required to be fenced,[85] or was not one of the places excepted,[86] that the time allowed by statute for the construction of the fences had elapsed,[87] and that the failure to fence occasioned the injury complained of.[88] However, in an action under the statute an allegation of negligence is unnecessary, and, if made, need not be proved,[89] unless under the terms of the statute defendant was under no obligation to fence at the place where the accident occurred.[90] Where the statute merely allows the landowner to construct the fences if not erected by the railroad company within a certain time after completion of the road, it does not affect the liability of the company for failure sooner to construct them, and it is not necessary for plaintiff to show that such time had elapsed at the time of the injury.[91]

c. Evidence Admissible under Pleadings

(1) In general
(2) Under allegations of negligence
(3) Under general issue or general denial

(1) In General

The evidence must correspond with the allegations and be restricted to the issues.

In compliance with general rules, as discussed in Negligence § 201 and Pleading §§ 524, 525, the evidence must correspond with the allegations and be restricted to the issues.[92] An allegation of the killing of the animals and their value made against a railroad whose track is fenced does not afford a basis for admitting evidence that animals were killed while on the track in the absence of a further averment of negligence.[93] An allegation that plaintiff's animal was killed by collision with defendant's train is sufficiently broad to admit evidence that it was so injured by the collision as to necessitate its being killed;[94] but since where animals are killed at different times the causes of action are separate and distinct, if the complaint charges only one occurrence, evidence is not admissible of injuries to animals at a time different from that alleged in the complaint.[95] An allegation that plaintiff sustained damages in a specific sum is tantamount to an allegation of value, and in the absence of demurrer is sufficient to permit evidence of the market value of the animals killed.[96] Evidence of a particular defect is admissible under an allegation in general terms of a defective fence without specifying the defect.[97]

(a) In General

Where negligence is alleged in general terms without specifying the particular acts constituting such negligence, evidence is admissible of any act or omission which tends to support the pleading.

Where negligence is alleged in general terms without specifying the particular acts constituting such negligence, evidence is admissible of any act or omission which tends to support the pleading,[98] or of any degree of negligence necessary to entitle plaintiff to recover.[99] Under such allegation if the action is at common law and not based on the statute, evidence is admissible of statutory negligence,[1] such as a failure to give crossing signals,[2] or running at a prohibited rate of speed,[3] and, if it merely alleges negligent killing or injury and the form of allegation is not objected to, the evidence is not limited to negligence in the operation of the train,[4] but plaintiff may show negligence on the part of the company consisting in the obstruction of a crossing,[5] or failure to fence its tracks.[6]

(b) Specific Acts of Negligence

If the plaintiff voluntarily limits his allegation of negligence to specific acts, evidence of the alleged acts or other acts of negligence necessarily implied therefrom is admissible, but evidence of negligence with respect to other acts is inadmissible.

If plaintiff voluntarily limits his allegation of negligence to specific acts, evidence of the alleged acts or other acts of negligence necessarily implied therefrom is admissible,[7] but evidence of negligence with respect to other than those alleged or necessarily implied therefrom is not admissible.[8] Thus, if the complaint charges a failure to fence, evidence is not admissible of negligence in the operation of the train,[9] or a defective condition of a crossing,[10] or a failure to give crossing signals as required by statute.[11] Under allegations of failure to erect and maintain fences, evidence that defendant's track was not fenced at the time and place of the accident is admissible.[12] An allegation of failure to erect and maintain fences and gates permits admission of evidence that the fences were down,[13] but not evidence of a gate being left open;[14] nor is such evidence admissible under an allegation of failure to keep a fence in repair.[15] Where the complaint charges a failure to maintain sufficient cattle guards at a public crossing as required by law, evidence of negligent delay in removing snow from the cattle guards is admissible.[16] An allegation that a gate fastening was out of repair will not admit evidence of want of fastening.[17]

Where the complaint contains a general allegation of negligence followed by allegations of specific acts, plaintiff is restricted to the specific acts if the words qualifying the general allegations are words of limitation;[18] and not restricted if they are words of enlargement.[19] If an allegation of a specific act of negligence is in somewhat general terms, evidence of particular facts having a tendency to prove the specific act alleged is admissible.[20]

(c) In Operation of Train

Under a general allegation of negligence in the operation of the train, which does not specify the particular acts constituting such negligence, the plaintiff may introduce evidence of any negligence connected with the operation of the train.

Under a general allegation of negligence in the operation of the train, which does not specify the particular acts constituting such negligence, plaintiff may introduce evidence of any negligence connected with the operation of the train,[21] and evidence is admissible of negligence in failing to keep a proper lookout for animals,[22] or in failing to use due care to avoid the injury after they were discovered;[23] or in operating the train at a prohibited or excessive rate of speed,[24] or in failing to give signals at crossings,[25] although there is also some authority to the contrary,[26] or in failing to ring a bell while running through city limits as required by an ordinance,[27] provided the action is at common law and not based specifically on the statute or ordinance prescribing the regulation[28]

On the other hand, under a general allegation of negligence in the operation of the train, the evidence must be confined to acts connected with the operation of the train,[29] and evidence is not admissible of a failure to fence,[30] although there is also some authority to the contrary,[31] or of a defective condition of a crossing,[32] or of the right of way,[33] or of the equipment of the train;[34] or failure to post notices of the injury as required by law;[35] or that a gate in the fence was left open,[36] or that the company had allowed the view of the track to become obstructed by bushes growing on the right of way;[37] or allowed substances calculated to attract animals to remain on the track[38] An allegation of failure to keep a proper lookout does not afford the basis for admitting evidence as to the nature of the headlight[39]

(3) Under General Issue or General Denial

Under the general issue or general denial, the defendant may not only put the plaintiff on proof of the whole charge contained in the complaint, but may give in evidence any evidence which contradicts or tends to contradict the material allegations of the complaint which the plaintiff must prove, and, under the broader general issue, subject to certain exceptions, evidence of any new matter of defense or avoidance which will defeat the plaintiff's claim is also admissible

In a common-law action on the case pursuant to the general rule, as discussed in Negligence § 201 b, defendant under a plea of general issue may not only put plaintiff on proof of the whole charge contained in the complaint,[40] but may give in evidence, subject to certain exceptions, evidence of any new matter of defense or avoidance which will defeat plaintiff's claim.[41] Under a plea of not guilty which puts in issue merely the breach of duty or wrongful act alleged to have been committed by defendant, evidence denying defendant's ownership or operation of the train causing the injury is not admissible thereunder.[42] Since, under a general denial, while proof of new matter is not authorized, facts independent of those alleged by plaintiff may be proved if they are inconsistent with the facts which he is bound to establish, as discussed in Pleading § 529, it has been held that, in a statutory action based on a failure to fence, defendant may show under a general denial that at the point where the animal came on the track it could not lawfully have maintained a fence,[43] even though in another count in the same action defendant has made a tender of single damages as a distinct defense to plaintiff's claim for double damages and has thereby admitted for the purpose of trial of that particular count that it ought to have fenced;[44] but the general denial puts in issue only defendant's right to fence at the place in question,[45] and, unless such affirmative defense is specially pleaded, defendant cannot show a limitation or release of liability growing out of a provision of its charter,[46] or conduct on the part of plaintiff amounting to an estoppel.[47]

Contributory negligence on the part of plaintiff, in order to be available as a defense, must be especially pleaded[48] unless the complaint alleges that plaintiff was without fault or negligence.[49]

d. Variance

In accordance with general rules, the proof must correspond substantially with the allegations of the pleadings. A material variance is generally fatal to a recovery, but an immaterial variance is not

In accordance with the general rules of pleading, proof must correspond substantially with the allegations of the pleadings.[50] Any material variance is fatal to a recovery;[51] but a variance as to matters not materially affecting the cause of action and by which defendant has not been misled to his prejudice may be disregarded as immaterial[52] or in such cases the complaint may be amended after the introduction of evidence so as to make it correspond with the facts as proved.[53]

§ 639. Presumptions and Burden of Proof

a. In general
b. Recovery of attorney's fees

a. In General

Where the statutes restrict the venue of actions for injury to animals to the place of injury, the burden of proof to bring the case within the provisions of the statutes is on the plaintiff.

Where the statutes restrict the venue of actions for injury to animals to the place of injury, the burden is on plaintiff to show according to the provision of the particular statute that the injury occurred in the county where the action is instituted,[54] or in the township or an adjoining township,[55] as the case may be.

Existence of local stock regulations. Where the general law of the state prohibits animals running at large, unless allowed to do so by local regulation, a person relying on an exemption from the general law has the burden of proving such exemption,[56] and the presumption, in the absence of evidence of local regulation, is that, in the county where the injury occurred, the general law is in force.[57]

b. Recovery of Attorney's Fees

Where recovery is sought under a statute allowing attorney's fees to the plaintiff on proof of certain facts, the burden is on the plaintiff to prove the facts authorizing recovery of attorney's fees, and as to what would be a reasonable fee under the circumstances.

Where recovery is sought under a statute allowing attorney's fees to plaintiff on proof of certain facts, the burden is on plaintiff to prove the facts authorizing recovery of attorney's fees,[58] and as to what would be a reasonable fee under the circumstances.[59] Accordingly, where the statute allows recovery of attorney's fees for failure to post notice of the injury or for failure or refusal to pay within the time fixed by statute after demand, the burden is on plaintiff to prove defendant's default in these respects to entitle him to recovery of attorney's fees.[60]

a. In General

In actions against railroad companies for injuries to animals, the burden is on the plaintiff to show every fact necessary to establish his cause of action, and, in the absence of statute, negligence on the part of the defendant will not be presumed.

In actions against railroad companies for injuries to animals, as in other actions, the burden is on plaintiff to show every fact necessary to establish his cause of action,[61] and he must show that the injury complained of was done by defendant.[62] In the absence of statute, negligence on the part of the company will not be presumed,[63] but on the contrary it will be presumed that the train was operated with ordinary care and diligence,[64] particularly where the animal injured was a trespasser,[65] and the burden is on plaintiff to show negligence on the part of the railroad or its employees[66] and that such negligence was the cause of the injury complained of,[67] even where the negligence consists in the omission of some statutory duty.[68] So, also, in jurisdictions where railroads are required to fence their tracks, if the animal came on the track at a place not required to be fenced, no presumption of negligence arises from the absence of a fence at such place,[69] and the burden is on plaintiff to show negligence,[70] and that such negligence was the cause of the injury.[71] Likewise, the same rule applies in cases where the animal came on the track by breaking over a sufficient fence or properly constructed cattle guard.[72]

b. Finding Dead or Injured Animal on or near Track

The mere fact that an animal is found dead or injured in the vicinity of a railroad track raises no legal presumption that it was killed or injured by a train, and the burden is on the plaintiff to establish by other evidence that it was so killed or injured.

The mere fact that an animal is found dead or injured in the vicinity of a railroad track raises no legal presumption that it was killed or injured by a train, and the burden is on plaintiff to establish by other evidence that it was so killed or injured.[73] Likewise, statutes establishing a presumption of negligence from the fact of injury or killing do not create any presumption of killing by the railroad from the fact of finding the carcass on or near the track.[74] Accordingly, where the body of an animal is found outside the right of way fence, the owner thereof has the burden of establishing that the animal was killed by the train before the statutory presumption of negligence may apply.[75]

c. Ownership or Possession of Animals

The burden is on the plaintiff to show either ownership or possession of the animal injured.

The burden is on plaintiff to show either ownership or possession of the animal injured,[76] and to prove joint ownership where it is claimed.[77] However, proof of plaintiff's possession is prima facie evidence of his ownership.[78]

d. Ownership or Operation of Train

The burden is on the plaintiff to prove the defendant's ownership or operation of the road where the injury occurred; but maintenance and ownership of the right of way create a presumption of operation of the trains running thereon.

The burden is on plaintiff to prove defendant's ownership or operation of the road where the injury occurred;[79] but maintenance and ownership of the right of way create a presumption of operation of the trains running thereon;[80] and a defendant in possession of tracks, and bridges is presumed to be the owner of the land on which they are built, in the absence of evidence to the contrary.[81] Where railroad tracks are being used by two or more different railroads, the presumption, in the absence of rebutting evidence, is that the railroad owning the right of way is the company operating the train which injured the animal,[82] and, if the action is brought against a company not owning the track, the burden is on plaintiff to prove that the injury was caused by one of defendant's trains.[83] Where defendant's operation of the railroad is established, the operation of the particular car or train responsible for the injury is presumed to be with defendant's authority and consent.[84]

§ 641. —— Fact of Killing or Injury

a. In general
b Statutory provisions
c. Existence or absence of lawful fence

a. In General

Although there is some authority to the contrary, in most jurisdictions, in the absence of statute, the mere fact that an animal is killed or injured by a train raises no presumption of negligence on the part of the railroad company or its servants, and the burden is on the plaintiff to show the existence of such negligence.

The rule followed in a majority of the jurisdictions is that, in the absence of statute, the mere fact that an animal is killed or injured by a train raises no presumption of negligence on the part of the railroad company or its servants,[85] and the burden is on plaintiff to show the existence of such negligence;[86] and this rule has been applied where the killing was at a place on the track which is not required to be fenced under the fencing statutes.[87]

In some jurisdictions, however, even in the absence of statute, although the burden of showing negligence on the part of the railroad company rests throughout the case on the owner of the livestock killed by the railroad train,[88] proof of the injury is prima facie evidence of negligence and the burden then shifts to the railroad company to go forward with the evidence to show that due care was exercised.[89] Where this latter rule is followed, it is not limited in its application to cases where defendant introduces no testimony,[90] but there is no longer a presumption of negligence whenever it is satisfactorily shown that those in charge of the train used all ordinary and reasonable care to avoid the injury.[91] Under this rule the existence of a stock law prohibiting animals from running at large does not destroy the presumption,[92] but is a material fact bearing on the effort of defendant to overcome the presumption.[93]

Still another view is that proof of the injury makes a prima facie case of negligence,[94] but that, where the animal was wrongfully at large, plaintiff's negligence in permitting the animal to be at large counterbalances the presumption of negligence arising from the fact of injury, and that the burden is on plaintiff to show such gross negligence or willful misconduct as will entitle him to recover under such circumstances.[95]

(4) Effect of failure to construct or maintain fence
(5) Effect of stock laws

(1) In General

In a number of jurisdictions the common-law rule as to the burden of proof has been changed by statute, and, under these statutes, it has been held that proof of the injury to an animal by a railroad train is prima facie evidence of negligence, placing the burden on the company to rebut the presumption of negligence

Although it has been stated in some decisions that a statute in terms stating that the killing is "prima facie evidence of negligence" means no more than evidence sufficient to carry the case to the jury and to justify, but not compel, a verdict as for a negligent wrong,[96] and does not place the burden on the railroad company to rebut the presumption of negligence,[97] in a number of jurisdictions the common-law rule as to the burden of proof has been changed by statute, and, under these statutes, proof of the injury to an animal by a railroad train is prima facie evidence of negligence placing the burden on the company to rebut the presumption of negligence,[98] and entitling plaintiff to recover in the absence of evidence in rebuttal.[99] Accordingly, where the statutes prescribe certain duties and precautions to be taken by the railroad, the burden is on the railroad to show that there was a compliance with the statutory requirements,[1] or legal excuse or justification for its noncompliance,[2] and the presumption is restricted, under some statutes, to cases of failure or violation of

Purpose of statute

The purpose of statutes creating a presumption that the servants of the railroad company were negligent in the operation of the train which caused the injury is to put the burden on the party to reveal the truth who is most nearly in a position to know the facts A train is a large and complex vehicle and naturally its crew members are in better position to know what, if anything, was wrong when an accident occurred For that reason the legislature saw fit to require in such cases that the company go forward with the evidence and show that its servants exercised all ordinary and reasonable care and diligence in operating the train—Powell v American Sumatra Tobacco Co., 17 So 2d 391, 154 Fla 227.

Kind of crossing

Owner of cattle having made prima facie case under statute against railroad injuring them, railroad, having duty to produce evidence of ordinary care, had burden of showing what kind of crossings were involved.—Hildebrand v. Chicago, B & Q R R, 17 P 2d 651, 45 Wyo. 175.

the statutory duty[3]

The statutes, however, as discussed supra § 640 b, raise no presumption that the railroad company did the killing or caused injury, which fact must be affirmatively shown by plaintiff; nor do they raise any presumption of wantonness or willful injury in cases where plaintiff's own evidence shows circumstances which would prevent his recovering merely on the ground of negligence;[4] and, if the complaint specifies the particular acts of negligence relied on, the presumption extends only to the particular negligence alleged;[5] but, where the suit is in a justice's court and there is no petition alleging negligence, the presumption will apply to any theory of negligence deducible from the facts as brought out by the evidence at the trial.[6]

Application of statutes. The statutory presumption has been held to apply to cases of injury as well as where the animal was killed,[7] and without regard to whether the injury was mortal or otherwise.[8] The statutory presumption has been applied to cases of injury to animals in the custody or under the control of the owner or some other person as well as to animals running at large,[9] and, in some jurisdictions, to injuries occasioned by trains, although not by collision with them,[10] but a larger number of statutes have been construed as restricting their application to injuries inflicted directly by the cars or engine[11] Under some of the statutes the presumption applies to injuries inflicted at certain places,[12] and only when the action is instituted within a certain time after the injury.[13] The statute applies to injuries inflicted by logging railroads.[14]

If the case, by reason of the circumstances of the injury or the time of instituting the action, is not within the application of the statute, the burden is on plaintiff to show negligence on the part of the railroad or its servants[15] The statute does not apply where the action is brought before the statute goes into effect,[16] unless the clause excepting existing rights, remedies, or defenses expressly states that the exception shall not apply to rules of evidence.[17]

Statutes making proof of the injury by a railroad train to "any cattle or other live stock" prima facie evidence of negligence, have no application to dogs,[18] geese,[19] or turkeys,[20] but, where the statute fixing the burden of proof on defendant railroad in terms applies to "property," dogs are held to be property, and to be within the statute.[21]

(2) Constitutionality of Statutes

Statutes placing the burden of proof on the railroad company to negative negligence on its part, when sued for injuries to animals, have been held valid.

Following the general constitutional doctrine limiting the power of the legislature in changing rules of evidence in civil cases to the making of rules which do not preclude a party from presenting the facts supporting his theory of the case, as discussed in Constitutional Law § 621, statutes placing the burden of proof on the railroad company to negative negligence on its part, when sued for injuries to animals, have been held valid[22] Accordingly, in order to uphold its constitutionality, a statute providing that a railroad company "shall be liable in law for any damage done to live stock or other property by the running of the cars or locomotives," although broad and positive in its terms, has been construed as imposing merely a prima facie liability and the burden of proof to show freedom from fault on the railroad company, but not depriving it of the opportunity to establish its nonliability by evidence in rebuttal.[23] A fortiori, a statute which in terms provides that the killing of animals by engines or cars shall be prima facie evidence of negligence on the part of defendant railroad is within the power of the legislature to enact.[24] However, following another rule of constitutional law, deduced from the general doctrine already stated, to the effect that the legislature may not arbitrarily provide that proof of one fact shall constitute even prima facie evidence of another fact that it has no reasonable tendency to establish, it has been held that a statute creating a presumption of the railroad's negligence from its killing of an animal on its track which is to prevail as against opposing testimony unless such testimony is found by the jury to preponderate, as distinguished from a presumption which merely supplies an inference of liability in the absence of evidence, is unconstitutional.[25]

(3) Evidence in Rebuttal

The statutory presumption of negligence or default in performance of a statutory duty arising from proof of killing or injury of an animal by a railroad train is not conclusive but may be rebutted and overcome by evidence.

The statutory presumption of negligence or default in performance of a statutory duty arising from proof of killing or injury of an animal by a railroad train is not conclusive but may be rebutted and overcome by evidence.[26] In order to rebut the presumption, defendant must show affirmatively that there was no negligence[27] or default in performance of a statutory duty,[28] directing[29] and confining[30] its proof to the particular acts of negligence or statutory default charged in plaintiff's pleading. The statutory presumption, it has been held, is merely a rule of evidence,[31] and it is effectually overcome, whenever it is satisfactorily shown that those in charge of the train used all ordinary and reasonable care to avoid the injury,[32] and that all the statutory requirements were com-

Weight and sufficiency of evidence where statutory presumption of negligence is rebutted generally see infra § 656.

"Ordinary care" defined

Prima facie case made by statute where railroad injured cattle could be met only by evidence showing "ordinary care," namely, that degree of care which under same or similar circumstances might reasonably be expected of ordinarily prudent person.—Hildebrand v. Chicago, B. & Q. R. R., 17 P.2d 651, 45 Wyo. 175

Evidence held sufficient to rebut statutory presumption

(1) In general.—Powell v. Rogers, 42 S.E.2d 573, 75 Ga.App. 165

(2) In action to recover damages for killing of plaintiff's mule by operation of defendant railroad company's train, defendant's evidence that visibility at time of accident was bad, that train was not being operated at over thirty-five miles per hour, that defendant's servants kept vigilant lookout ahead and rang locomotive bell, blew whistle, applied brakes, and did everything within their power to avoid striking mule after discovering it on track, was sufficient, as matter of law, to rebut

plied with,[33] or that compliance was impossible or would have been unavailing,[34] or that there was no negligence as to keeping a lookout and after the animal was discovered all possible precautions were taken,[35] or that under the circumstances nothing which might have been done could have avoided the accident.[36]

In some jurisdictions when the railroad company introduces some evidence of the exercise of reasonable care and skill, the presumption vanishes,[37] while in others it has been held that merely some evidence is not sufficient to cause the presumption to vanish,[38] but it must be adequate to meet or balance the prima facie case,[39] which can be done only by evidence which shows the contrary or opposite of the negligence presumed.[40] In still other jurisdictions, it has been held that in view of the fact that the statutory presumption of negligence arises without any evidence of negligence, less evidence is required to rebut it than would be necessary if plaintiff made proof of actual negligence,[41] and, where the facts as to the killing are all put in evidence, the statute has no application.[42]

Subject to the above rules, it has been held that it is not sufficient to show merely that there was probably no negligence [43] or that those in charge of the train knew nothing of the occurrence of the injury,[44] or to show the exercise of due care in one respect only,[45] as that all efforts were made to avoid the injury after discovery of the animal without showing that a proper lookout was maintained,[46] or the crossing signals given,[47] or where negligence might be imputed to the company from the acts or omissions of two or more of its servants to show the exercise of due care on the part of only one of them.[48]

In any event, when satisfactory evidence of reasonable care has been introduced in rebuttal by the railroad company, such evidence is controlling, if not discredited or contradicted,[49] and cannot arbitrarily be disregarded,[50] and the burden then shifts to plaintiff to establish defendant's negligence statutory prima facie presumption of their want of reasonable skill and care —Atlantic Coast Line R Co v Rowe, 64 S E 2d 216, 83 Ga App 540

(3) Evidence that locomotive headlights were adjusted to shine on roadbed and that engineer was looking ahead constantly but could not see cow approaching track up a slight incline until it was within eight feet of track, fifty feet from locomotive, and that he immediately gave cattle alarm and applied brakes but could not stop train in time to avoid striking cow, overcame statutory presumption of negligence —Atlantic Coast Line R Co v Martin, 53 S E 2d 176, 79 Ga App 194

(4) In action against railroad for damages for killing of cattle, presumption of negligence created by proof that cattle were killed by train was rebutted when railroad introduced testimony of engineer and fireman which clearly explained every material fact connected with the killing.—Macon, D. & S R. Co v Stephens, 19 S.E 2d 32, 66 Ga App. 636.

Sufficient weight to overcome

Under statute, where owner proved that his mules were killed by train, a case in owner's favor was made out, and it then devolved on railroad company, if it would exculpate itself from inference of negligence arising from owner's proof, to adduce proof of sufficient weight to overcome it —Edwards v Thompson, La App, 2 So 2d 493.

by a preponderance of the evidence, without any aid from the statutory presumption of negligence,[51] although in some jurisdictions under similar statutes it has been held that, even though the presumption disappears with the introduction of contrary evidence by defendant, the burden still remains on defendant to overcome with his evidence the inferences naturally deducible from the facts presented by plaintiff in support of his charge of negligence or violation of a statutory duty.[52]

(4) Effect of Failure to Construct or Maintain Fence

In the absence of a statutory obligation to fence, a statutory presumption of negligence arising from the killing of animals casts on a railroad company, which has failed to fence its tracks, the burden of proving that the injuries to stock on its track were not caused by its negligence

In the absence of a statutory obligation to fence, a statutory presumption arising from the killing of animals casts on a railroad company, which has failed to fence its tracks, the burden of proving that the injuries to stock on its track were not caused by its negligence[53] Where there is a statutory obligation to fence, and where the provisions creating a presumption of negligence from the killing are construed to be applicable only when animals are killed or injured at places where the statute makes it the duty of the railroad to fence, the presumption does not apply where the injuries are inflicted at places where, under the statute, the railroad is not required to fence[54] However, where the statutory provisions creating the presumption against the railroad are in general terms and contain no exceptions in favor of railroads as to accidents occurring in places where fencing is not required, it has been held that the presumption does apply with respect to the killing of animals at such places.[55]

(5) Effect of Stock Laws

Although there is authority to the contrary, generally in jurisdictions where proof of injury raises a presumption of negligence which must be rebutted by the railroad company, the existence of stock laws prohibiting animals from running at large does not destroy the presumption.

In jurisdictions where proof of injury raises a presumption of negligence which must be rebutted by the railroad company, the existence of stock laws prohibiting animals from running at large does not destroy the presumption.[56] However, in some jurisdictions, where animals are permitted to run at large in violation of a local regulation, the presumption of negligence has been held inapplicable,[57] and plaintiff has the burden of showing negligence on the part of the railroad company.[58]

c. Existence or Absence of Lawful Fence

In the absence of a statute providing otherwise, where a railroad company has properly fenced its tracks, no presumption of negligence arises from the mere fact that an animal was injured thereon, and the burden is on the plaintiff to show that there was negligence on the part of the company which caused the injury.

Where a railroad company has properly fenced its tracks, no presumption of negligence, except where, and to the extent that, the matter may be affected by statutory provisions, arises from the mere fact that an animal was injured thereon,[59] and the burden is on plaintiff to show that there was negligence on the part of the company which caused the injury complained of,[60] and that there was such negligence after the animal was discovered on the track.[61] Likewise, there is no presumption of negligence from the killing at places unfenced where, under the fencing statute, the railroad is under no obligation to fence,[62] and the burden is on plaintiff in such cases to establish the negligence of the railroad and that it caused the death of plaintiff's animal.[63]

§ 642. —— Fences and Cattle Guards

a. In general
b. Places required to be fenced
c. Place of entry
d. Defects

a. In General

In an action based on a fencing statute, as a general rule a prima facie case for the plaintiff is made by proof of plaintiff's ownership of the stock, the injury, and a failure to fence at the place in question.

In an action based on a fencing statute, as a general rule a prima facie case for plaintiff is made by proof of plaintiff's ownership of the stock, the injury, and a failure to fence at the place in question,[64] and the burden is on defendant to show any facts or circumstances relieving it from this duty,[65] unless such facts appear from plaintiff's evidence.[66] Likewise, it is generally held that the burden is on plaintiff to show that the road was not fenced[67] at the place where the animal came on the track, as discussed infra subdivision c of this section, although some statutes are construed as placing the burden on defendant to show that the road was fenced.[68] The general rule applied to actions under the various statutes is that plaintiff has the burden of proving every fact necessary to bring the case within the application of the particular statute on which the action is based,[69] as, for example, that the railroad's failure to fence was at a place where it was required to fence, as considered infra subdivision b of this section, or that he is a person entitled to the benefit of the statute,[70] or that the facts entitling him to the recovery of double damages existed.[71] In an action under the statute to recover damages occasioned by the railroad's failure to fence, the burden is on plaintiff to show that the injury was a consequence of the absence of the fence,[72] or of a sufficient cattle guard;[73] but, where the injury and failure to fence are shown, plaintiff will be aided by a presumption that one was occasioned by the other in the absence of evidence on that point.[74]

Where defendant admits its failure to fence but seeks to avoid liability therefor on the ground of plaintiff's agreement to maintain the fence and his receipt of compensation therefor,[75] or on the ground that, even if a lawful fence had been constructed and maintained, it could not have restrained the particular animal that was injured,[76] the burden is on it to establish these affirmative defenses by proof, there being in the latter case a presumption that a good and lawful fence such as the company is required to construct will exclude all domestic animals.[77]

Effect of failure to construct and maintain fence as related to statutory presumption of negligence see supra subdivision b (4) of this section.

Contractual liability. In an action to recover for injuries to plaintiff's animals based on defendant railroad's failure to fence its track in accordance with its agreement to do so, a presumption of the existence of such agreement is raised by proof of the maintenance of such a fence for the prescriptive period of twenty years.[78]

b. Places Required to Be Fenced

If the statute by express terms requires fencing only at certain places or excepts certain places, the burden is on the plaintiff to show that the place in question was one which the company was required to fence, or was not one of the places excepted. If the place is one impliedly excepted, the burden is on the defendant to show that it was one which could not lawfully or properly have been fenced.

If the statute by express terms requires fencing only at certain places or excepts certain places, the burden is on plaintiff to show that the place in question was one which the company was required to fence,[79] or was not one of the places excepted,[80] although in proving that the place of injury was not in a village or town plaintiff need only show that it was beyond the group of houses composing the village or town,[81] and the burden is on defendant to show that the village or town extended beyond the houses if such was the fact.[82] If the place is one impliedly excepted, as distinguished from the places expressly excepted, the burden is on defendant to show that it was one which could not lawfully or properly have been fenced,[83] as, for example, where maintenance of fences or cattle guards would endanger the lives or safety of the company's employees,[84] or would obstruct the public highway,[85] unless such facts appear from plaintiff's own evidence.[86] If defendant bases its claim of immunity from obligation to fence on the fact that the accident happened on station grounds, the burden rests on it to show the extent of space necessary to be kept open for station purposes.[87] The mere fact that the railroad has fenced a part of its track at a place where it was not obliged by law to fence does not furnish any ground for a presumption that the railroad has made a trap by so doing.[88]

c. Place of Entry

In order to recover against a railroad company for injuries to animals on the ground of failure to fence, the plaintiff must prove that the animal entered on the right of way at a place where the defendant was under a duty to fence, and that the defendant had failed to discharge that duty; but, if there is no evidence as to where the animal came on the track, it will be presumed that it came on the track at the place where it was killed or injured.

Since the place of entry governs the liability, as discussed supra § 567, in order to recover against a railroad company for injuries to animals on the ground of failure to fence, plaintiff must prove that the animal entered on the right of way at a place where defendant was under a duty to fence, and that defendant had failed to discharge that duty,[89] and circumstantial evidence from which the fact can be legitimately inferred is sufficient for that purpose.[90] However, if there is no evidence as to where the animal came on the track, it will be presumed that it came on the track at the place where it was killed or injured.[91] Where there are two or more openings in the fence, which it was the railroad's duty to keep closed, it is not necessary to prove through which opening the animal went onto the track where it appears in the evidence that it went through one of them,[92] and it has been held that it is not necessary to prove entry on the track at a place where the railroad should have fenced but had not, except where the animal is struck at a point where the railroad is not required to fence.[93] On the other hand, if there is no evidence as to the place of entry and it is shown that the place of injury was one not required to be fenced, it is also presumed that the company was not required to fence where the animal entered.[94] The presumption that the place of injury was also the place of entry is a rebuttable one,[95] and, where there is proof of the place of entry, there is no occasion for indulging in any presumption.[96]

d. Defects

In an action based on a failure of the railroad company to maintain fences and cattle guards in a proper state of repair, the burden is on the plaintiff to show that they are not sufficient for the purposes for which they were intended.

A statute requiring railroads to erect fences and cattle guards does not raise a conclusive presumption as a matter of law that they do not comply with the statute when for any reason stock get on the right of way and are injured,[97] and the burden is on plaintiff to show that they are not sufficient for the purposes for which they were intended and constructed,[98] that the animal came on the track through or over such defective fence or cattle guard,[99] and that the place where the animal came on the track by reason of such defect was one which the company was required to fence.[1] Where this is shown, a prima facie case of negligence on the part of the railroad company is made,[2] and the burden is on defendant to show its freedom from negligence.[3] Where it is shown that an animal escaped from an adjoining inclosure through a fence which defendant was bound to maintain and which at some places was defective and at others sufficient, it will be presumed in the absence of evidence to the contrary that the animal escaped at the place where the fence was insufficient.[4]

Where liability is limited to cases of collision between the animal and the train after the animal came on the track through a defective fence, the burden is on plaintiff to prove not merely the defect, but also the negligence of the railroad company beyond the matter of a defective fence where the injuries were received in some way other than in a collision with the train.[5] Accordingly, it has been held that plaintiff has the burden of further showing that defendant should reasonably have foreseen the possible presence of animals in an inclosure from which they might escape and wander on the right of way through the defective fence.[6]

Knowledge of defect on the part of the railroad necessary to charge it with neglect in maintenance of a fence or cattle guard will be presumed without proof of actual notice, where the defect is shown to have existed for an unreasonable length of time.[7]

§ 643. —— Crossings, Gates, and Bars

In an action for injury to an animal based on the defective condition of a crossing, the burden is on the plaintiff to show that the injury occurred at the crossing and by reason of its defective condition; and, where the animal is injured by passing through a gate or bars in a railroad fence, the burden of proof is on the plaintiff to show that the gate or bars were open through the defendant's fault.

In an action for injury to an animal based on the defective condition of a crossing, the burden is on plaintiff to show that the injury occurred at the crossing and by reason of its defective condition;[8] and plaintiff is not relieved of that burden by a statute requiring railroads to erect and maintain fences with farm crossings and gates wherever reasonably necessary and imposing liability on them for failure to do so;[9] but, where the defective condition and the railroad's knowledge of it for a time long enough to have remedied it are shown, the burden is on the railroad to show that the defective condition was not the cause of the injury.[10] Where a statute requiring an opening in a railroad fence for the convenience of the owner of land through which the railroad passes makes no provision as to the nature or kind of opening but leaves that detail to be determined by the landowner and railroad, there is a presumption of the adequacy and sufficiency of the opening in the absence of evidence to the contrary;[11] but, where a gate is shown to have been

below the standard required by statute, and that the animal broke down the gate and went onto the track and was killed, plaintiff is relieved of the burden of showing that the negligence of the railroad company caused the injury,[12] especially where the statute itself provides that proof of damage and violation of the statute shall constitute a prima facie case[13]

Open gates or bars. In an action for injury to animals which went on the track through a gate or bars in the railroad fence, the burden of proof is on plaintiff to show that the gate or bars were open through defendant's fault,[14] either by being left open by defendant,[15] or by being open because of a defective condition which was known or should have been known to defendant.[16] If the railroad does show that the gate, although equipped with defective fastenings, was shut and securely fastened a short time before the accident, there is no presumption that the defective condition was the proximate cause of the injury.[17] The burden of showing that the gates were left open by the landowner or third person is on the railroad.[18] However, where it appears that the gates had been left open,[19] or the bars had been left down by some third person,[20] the burden is on plaintiff to show that the condition had existed for such a length of time after the company knew or should have known of it as to charge it with negligence in not remedying the situation.

§ 644. —— Rate of Speed

Where it is shown that an animal was injured by a train which was running at a prohibited rate of speed, a presumption arises that the injury was the result of the negligence of the railroad company, and the burden is on the company to rebut it.

In an action to recover for injury to an animal on the ground of negligence in running a train at a rate of speed in violation of an ordinance, plaintiff has the burden of proving that the ordinance was in force at the time of the injury,[21] and, where it is shown that an animal was injured by a train which was running at a prohibited rate of speed, a presumption arises that the injury was the result of the negligence of the company,[22] and the burden is on the company to rebut it[23] On the other hand, in the absence of statute, plaintiff has the burden of proving that the injury was directly due to such excessive rate of speed[24]

Curve crossed by public highway. Under some statutes where any curve is crossed by a public highway, the railroad company has the burden of proving that the train approached and passed the crossing at such speed as to prevent an accident in the event of an obstruction at the crossing[25]

§ 645. —— Signals and Lookouts

a. In general
b. Precautions as to animals seen on or near track

a. In General

In an action based on a failure to give crossing signals as required by statute, the burden is on the plaintiff to show that the signal was not given, and also that such omission was the cause of the injury complained of, unless the statute places the burden on the defendant, but, under statutes making proof of injury prima facie evidence of negligence, the burden is on the railroad company to show that signals were given, and that a proper lookout was maintained.

In an action based on a failure to give crossing signals as required by statute, the burden is on plaintiff to show that the signal was not given,[26] and also that such omission was the cause of the injury complained of,[27] and the burden of establishing his case remains on plaintiff throughout, notwithstanding the burden of going ahead with the evidence shifts after establishment of a prima facie case.[28] However, where the statute so provides, the burden is on defendant to show that the omission was not the cause of the injury[29]

Under statutes making proof of the injury prima facie evidence of negligence and placing the burden of proof on the company to show that all the statutory requirements were complied with, the burden is on the company to show that the signals were given,[30] and that a proper lookout was maintained,[31] or that a failure to give signals was not the cause of the injury,[32] and, in the absence of statute, it has been held sufficient to constitute a prima facie case to show that the animal was on the track where it could have been seen, if a proper lookout had been maintained, for a distance within which the train might have been stopped.[33] On the other hand, no presumption of negligent operation in failure to keep a lookout for stock arises from uncontradicted proof of the necessary attention of train employees to performance of their paramount duty to protect property intrusted to them[34]

Under a statute requiring crossing signals in towns and villages but not in cities, a place of village size will be presumed to be a village in the absence of evidence of its incorporation as a city.[35]

b. Precautions as to Animals Seen on or near Track

In the absence of statute, if the animal injured was wrongfully on the track, the burden is on the plaintiff to show that the defendant's servants saw the animal in peril in time to have avoided the injury, and negligence on the part of the railroad company after the animal was discovered.

In the absence of statute, if the animal injured was wrongfully on the track, the burden is on plaintiff to show that defendant's servants saw the animal in peril in time to have avoided the injury,[36] and negligence on the part of the railroad company after the animal was discovered;[37] and in such case no presumption that the servants saw the trespassing animal in time to save him arises from the fact that the track was straight and the view unobstructed[38] Likewise, there is no presumption of defendant's knowledge of plaintiff's crossing the track with his animals from a few instances of the crossing of other herds of cattle[39] However, the fact of the collision of the train and animal and the speed of the train may furnish ground for the presumption that the animal was on or near the track a time long enough before being struck to give the railroad employees opportunity to avoid the accident[40] Ordinarily, in any case where the question is whether defendant was negligent in failing to stop the train after discovering the animal on the track, the burden of proof is on plaintiff,[41] but it has been held that, where the evidence shows that an animal ran along the track in front of the train for a distance within which a train could ordinarily be stopped, if there were any circumstances in the particular case making it unsafe or impracticable to stop the train, the burden is on defendant to show this fact.[42]

In most jurisdictions, in actions for injuries to animals, the burden of proving the owner's contributory negligence is on the railroad company.

In most jurisdictions, in actions for injuries to animals, the burden of proving the owner's contributory negligence is on the railroad company[43] Even in jurisdictions where the burden is on plaintiff to prove freedom from contributory negligence, the burden is on defendant to prove the willfulness of plaintiff's act wherever defendant has made that a part of his defense.[44]

On the other hand, in some jurisdictions, the burden is on plaintiff to show that he was not guilty of contributory negligence.[45] Accordingly, it has been held that, where the animal injured was in charge of or under the control of the owner or some person representing him, the burden is on plaintiff to show the absence of contributory negligence[46] However, also in this group, in states following the common-law rule as to animals running at large but modifying it to the extent of holding that the mere fact that an animal is unlawfully at large does not, as between the owner and the railroad company, constitute contributory negligence unless done under circumstances making the injuries the natural and proximate result of the act, it has been held that the burden of proving the circumstances that make the allowing of animals to run at large contributory negligence in a particular case is on the railroad company.[47] Where the animal injured was at large, which, under the general law, was unlawful unless authorized by the town where the injury occurred, the burden of showing such an exemption from the operation of the general law is on plaintiff[48]

§ 647. Admissibility of Evidence

General rules as to the admissibility of evidence apply in actions against railroad companies for injury to animals.

General rules as to the admissibility of evidence apply in actions against railroad companies for injury to animals.[49] Ordinarily evidence is admissible of all facts and circumstances which reasonably tend to establish or disprove the matters in issue,[50] but evidence which is irrelevant and can throw no light on the subject under investigation is inadmissible.[51] It is also proper to exclude evidence as to general matters which are sufficiently within the knowledge of the jury[52] or as to facts which, being conceded, would not affect defendant's liability in the particular case.[53]

Subsequent repairs. In actions for injuries to animals, it is generally held that evidence of repairs made subsequent to the injury complained of is not admissible as an admission on the part of defendant of prior insufficiency or for the purpose of showing past negligence.[54]

Effect of failure to permit examination of injured animals Evidence as to the nature and extent of injuries to plaintiff's animals caused by defendant's train will be excluded where plaintiff refuses to permit an examination of such animals[55] However, in order for defendant to avail itself of this rule, its request for examination must be made at a time when, if granted, plaintiff will have an opportunity to prepare to meet or offset the testimony of the veterinarian of defendant's choice.[56]

§ 648. —— Customary Methods and Acts

As a general rule evidence of customary or habitual conduct of the defendant railroad company is not admissible to show the existence or absence of negligence at the time of the accident.

As a general rule evidence of customary or habitual conduct of defendant railroad company is not admissible to show the existence or absence of negligence at the time of the accident.[57] Accordingly, evidence of the usual speed of defendant's train at the place of injury before and after the injury complained of is not admissible as evidence of negligence at the time of the injury.[58] However, evidence of instructions given by the station agent to other consignees of freight as to the place for stopping teams is admissible to show that plaintiff's conduct was in accordance with the railroad's general course of business with others and should therefore have been anticipated by defendant.[59]

§ 649. —— Similar Facts or Transactions

a. In general
b. Experiments

a. In General

The evidence ordinarily must be limited to the facts and circumstances of the particular injury complained of, and evidence of negligence in the operation of other trains at other times or places is not admissible to prove negligence at the time and place of the injury.

Following general rules, the evidence ordinarily must be limited to the facts and circumstances of the particular injury complained of,[60] and evidence of negligence in the operation of other trains at other times or places is not admissible to prove negligence at the time and place of the injury,[61] although it may be admissible on cross-examination to discredit a witness.[62] Likewise, evidence of injuries to other animals at the same place at different times,[63] or even at the same time,[64] is inadmissible to prove negligence at a particular time, except, as discussed infra § 652, for the restricted purpose of showing that defendant had knowledge that animals were running at large at that place, and as bearing on the duty of its employees to keep a lookout for them.

b. Experiments

The general rule governing the admissibility of experiments applies in actions to recover damages for animals injured by railroads.

The general rule governing the admissibility of experiments applies in actions to recover damages for animals injured by railroads.[65] Where conditions are substantially similar, evidence of experiments to determine whether a slat holding a gate shut would work out is admissible,[66] and so testimony as to experiments made by witnesses with the gate shortly after the injury is admissible to show its condition.[67] Evidence of experiments to determine the extent of view at a railroad crossing,[68] the distance at which an animal could be seen,[69] or as to the existence or effect of any obstruction of view,[70] is admissible, provided such experiments were made at the place and under conditions similar to those existing at the time of the injury.[71]

§ 650. —— Fences and Cattle Guards

a. In general
b. Condition

a. In General

Evidence of negligence in the operation of the train has been held irrelevant and inadmissible in an action based on a statutory liability for failure to fence; but, in an action based on negligence in the operation of the train, evidence of the absence of fences or cattle guards is admissible as bearing on the degree of care to be exercised.

Evidence of negligence in the operation of the train has been held irrelevant and inadmissible in an action based on a statutory liability for failure to fence[72] unless the action, although brought under the statute, is for frightening animals.[73] However, in an action based on negligence in the operation of the train, evidence of the absence of fences or cattle guards is admissible as bearing on the degree of care to be exercised;[74] and evidence that the owner of the animal had been paid for constructing and maintaining the fence at the place where the animal came upon the track is admissible to rebut any inference of negligence on the part of the railroad arising from the absence of a fence.[75] Irrelevant evidence on the issue of negligence in maintaining fences or cattle guards is not admissible.[76] In an action based on a failure to fence where it is claimed that the injury occurred upon defendant's depot grounds, a deed of the land purchased for such ground is inadmissible,[77] and, where the railroad tracks do not intersect the streets of platted ground, the plat is not admissible.[78]

b. Condition

(1) In general
(2) At time of injury and prior and subsequent thereto
(3) At place of entry and elsewhere
(4) Other accidents, injuries, or defects
(5) Subsequent repairs

(1) In General

In an action based on the alleged insufficiency of fences or cattle guards, evidence which has a tendency to prove the sufficiency or insufficiency of such fences or cattle guards is admissible.

In an action based on the alleged insufficiency of fences or cattle guards, it has been held that evidence is not admissible that the cattle guard in question was the same as those in general use on defendant's road,[79] but it has also been held that evidence that the same make of cattle guard was in general use among well-equipped railroads and was regarded as the best known make is admissible as tending to show the sufficiency of the cattle guard in question.[80] Evidence which has a tendency to prove the defective condition of fences or cattle guards is admissible,[81] while evidence having no relation to the issue is inadmissible.[82] Evidence of the length of time that a fence had been out of repair,[83] or of notice by plaintiff to defendant of the defective condition,[84] is admissible to show defendant's knowledge of it if the notice appears to have been given prior to the time of the accident. Evidence of a condition offered by plaintiff in rebuttal of the condition alleged and proved by defendant's evidence is admissible, even though properly a part of plaintiff's evidence on direct examination but not offered by plaintiff at that time.[85]

(2) At Time of Injury and Prior and Subsequent Thereto

In an action for injuries to animals based on the defective condition of fences and cattle guards, only such evidence is admissible as tends to show the condition of the fences and cattle guards at the time of the injury.

Since the liability of a railroad company for a defective condition of its fences or cattle guards depends on their condition at the time of the injury alleged to have resulted therefrom, only such evidence is admissible as tends to show the condition at that time,[86] but whether evidence of their condition at other times is admissible for this purpose depends on the circumstances.[87] Evidence is admissible of a defective condition at a time prior to the injury if accompanied by evidence that such condition had continued up to the time of the injury.[88] Evidence of their condition at a time subsequent to the injury ordinarily is not admissible in the absence of other evidence showing that there had been no change of condition in the meanwhile;[89] but where it is shown directly or by inference that no change has occurred it is competent, and admissible, if relevant.[90] Likewise, it has also been held that evidence is admissible as to the condition very shortly after the injury[91] unless there is evidence tending to show a change of condition.[92]

(3) At Place of Entry and Elsewhere

Since the liability of the railroad company depends on the condition of the fence at the place where the animal came upon the tracks, evidence ordinarily should be limited to the condition at the place of entry.

Since the liability of the railroad company depends on the condition of the fence at the place where the animal came upon the track, evidence ordinarily should be limited to the condition at the place of entry,[93] although evidence of the condition at other places may sometimes be admissible for purposes of rebuttal.[94] Where it appears in evidence that the animal entered at a place other than where it was injured, evidence is not admissible as to the condition of the fence at the place of injury,[95] except to show by way of corroboration the defective condition at the place of entry[96] or to charge defendant with knowledge thereof.[97]

(4) Other Accidents, Injuries, or Defects

For the purpose of showing the insufficiency of a fence or cattle guard, it has been held that evidence is admissible that other animals had previously got over the fence or cattle guard at the same place, or over a different cattle guard if it is shown to be of the same kind and character as the one in question, and that there was a similarity of conditions.

For the purpose of showing the insufficiency of a fence or cattle guard, it has been held that evidence is admissible that other animals had previously got over the fence[98] or cattle guard[99] at the same place, or over a different cattle guard if it is shown to be of the same kind and character as the one in question.[1] However, in the absence of evidence of similarity of conditions, evidence having reference to other cattle guards is inadmissible;[2] nor is similarity of conditions sufficiently established by showing merely that cattle guards are of similar construction.[3]

(5) Subsequent Repairs

In an action based on the defective condition of fences, evidence of repairs made subsequently to the injury complained of is not admissible as an admission on the part of the defendant of prior insufficiency or for the purpose of showing past negligence, but such evidence may be admissible on other issues.

In an action based on the defective condition of fences, evidence of repairs made subsequently to the injury complained of is not admissible as an admission on the part of defendant of prior insufficiency or for the purpose of showing past negligence.[4] On other issues, however, evidence of subsequent repairs has been held admissible,[5] as, for example, to show that the defect was one which it was defendant's duty to repair,[6] or that the railroad regarded the place in question as one which might lawfully be fenced,[7] or to show the place[8] or the conditions at the place[9] where the animal entered the right of way.

In actions based on defective or insufficient crossings, gates, or bars, evidence having a bearing on the disputed issues involved is admissible, while evidence having no bearing on the issues involved is not admissible.

Evidence tending to establish the insufficiency of a gate or its fastenings and having a bearing on the disputed issues of whether or not a gate was open, and, if open, what caused it to be so, is admissible,[10] while evidence having no bearing on the issues involved is not admissible.[11] Where the action is based on a failure to maintain a gate at a crossing, evidence offered on the part of defendant tending to show that it was not required to maintain cattle guards also is irrelevant.[12]

Similar facts and transactions. In an action based on the defective condition of a crossing, evidence that other animals had been injured on the same crossing is not admissible[13] except for the restricted purpose of showing that the crossing was unsafe[14] or that the railroad had notice of the defect.[15] For the purpose of showing the insufficiency of a gate, it has been held that evidence is admissible that similar fastenings for gates had proved insufficient where the court instructed the jury that before such evidence could be considered it must be shown not only that the fastenings were similar but that the manner in which they were put on and the gates hung were in all respects alike,[16] but evidence is not admissible that the fastenings on the gate in question were like those in general use in the absence of evidence of the sufficiency of those in general use and of similarity of conditions of use between the particular fastener and those in general use.[17] Likewise, it has been held that in the absence of similarity of conditions, evidence having reference to other gates is inadmissible.[18]

Where there is evidence that bars were improperly constructed, evidence that they had frequently been down and defendant's servants had somtimes put them up is admissible to show knowledge on the part of the company of the defect.[19]

Condition at time of injury. In an action based on negligence of the railroad company in leaving open a gate in the railroad fence, evidence is not admissible that on a former occasion defendant's agent was seen to pass through the gate without closing it.[20] However, where it is alleged that animals strayed on the track through a gate and were injured, evidence as to the position of the gate on the morning following the accident has been held admissible where there is no evidence that the gate had been moved.[21]

Subsequent repairs In an action based on the defective condition of gates[22] or crossings,[23] it is generally held that evidence of repairs made subsequently to the injury complained of is not admissible as an admission on the part of the defendant of prior insufficiency or for the purpose of showing past negligence. However, it has been held that evidence of subsequent repairs to gates is admissible on other issues,[24] as, for example, to show that the defect was one which it was defendant's duty to repair.[25]

§ 652. —— Operation of Trains

General rules as to the admissibility of evidence apply in an action for injury to animals due to negligence in the operation of a train.

General rules as to the admissibility of evidence apply in an action for injury to animals due to negligence in the operation of a train [26] Accordingly, evidence is admissible as to the character and equipment of the locomotive,[27] and, if the injury occurred at night, the character of headlight carried[28] and its condition;[29] the character of the place of the injury with respect to the custom of animals to be there in large numbers;[30] the distance of an animal from the tracks when first seen by the engineer;[31] the distance an animal could be seen at the time and place of the injury;[32] the distance an animal was dragged along the track;[33] and the existence and validity of stock laws.[34] Likewise, evidence has been held admissible as to the failure to give signals[35] unless the accident happened at a place where the railroad was not bound to give them,[36] a failure to hear them,[37]

and the ability of the witness to hear them,[38] if they had been given; also evidence whether the view of the track was obstructed[39] or the attention of the motorman distracted is admissible.[40]

Where the engineer testifies that it was a very dark night, plaintiff may introduce in rebuttal evidence of the phase of the moon and the hour at which it rose.[41] Testimony of the engineer that after the animal was seen he could not have stopped the train without endangering its safety and that of the passengers is admissible,[42] and, as an expert, an engineer or conductor may testify that he did all that could be done to avert the injury,[43] but the testimony of other witnesses as to whether the engineer could have done anything more than he did to avoid the injury has been held inadmissible.[44] Evidence that after the injury complained of signboards were erected and signals given at the crossing where the injury occurred is not admissible.[45]

Evidence having no bearing on the question of negligence in the operation of the train is not admissible.[46]

Speed of train. Evidence is admissible as to the speed of the train,[47] although, where there is no statute to control the rate of speed at which a train may run, evidence of speed has been held inadmissible in an action by the owner of animals injured while trespassing.[48] Evidence that the engineer did not decrease the speed of the train has been held admissible in support of an allegation to that effect.[49]

Evidence of injuries to other animals at the same place at different times is admissible for the restricted purpose of showing that the railroad had knowledge that animals were running at large at that place and as bearing on the duty of its employees to keep a lookout for them.[50]

§ 653. —— Violation of Statutes and Ordinances

Where statutes requiring crossing signals are intended for the benefit of animals as well as persons, in an action for injury to an animal rightfully upon, or in the immediate vicinity of, a highway crossing, evidence of a failure to give such signals is admissible on the question of the defendant's negligence.

In jurisdictions where it is held that statutes requiring crossing signals are intended for the benefit of animals as well as persons, in an action for injury to an animal rightfully upon, or in the immediate vicinity of, a highway crossing, evidence of a failure to give such signals is admissible on the question of defendant's negligence,[51] but where such signals are held as intended as a warning to persons only such evidence is not admissible.[52] In jurisdictions where failure to give the statutory signals at crossings is admissible, evidence as to whether the animal would probably have been frightened away if they had been given is not admissible.[53] In actions for negligent injury to animals in a town or city, an ordinance is admissible which limits the rate of speed within the corporate limits[54] unless the ordinance applies only to a particular railroad other than defendant, and defendant is not the lessee of, and does not use the tracks of, the affected railroad,[55] but there is also some authority for excluding an ordinance limiting the rate of speed within town or city limits.[56] An ordinance requiring a bell to be continuously rung on all engines while passing through town limits is admissible.[57]

§ 654. —— Contributory Negligence of Owner

In an action for injury to animals, any competent evidence having a logical and material tendency to prove contributory negligence or the lack thereof on the part of the plaintiff is admissible.

Where the animal injured escaped from plaintiff's field through a defective railroad fence which it was defendant's duty to maintain, evidence of notice to the owner that the animal had on previous occasions escaped and been upon the track is immaterial,[58] nor is it competent for defendant to show that plaintiff had said that he had driven the animals loose along the highway many times before and had never had an accident,[59] or that plaintiff's servant had driven plaintiff's cattle on the railroad on several previous occasions, in the absence of evidence that such servant drove them onto the railroad at the time they were injured,[60] or that plaintiff's cattle had previously escaped from his pasture onto the highway without reference to the time it happened or to any defect in plaintiff's fence through which the escape was made.[61] However, evidence of prior escapes is admissible to prove a breachy habit requiring more than the usual care from plaintiff, after evidence that plaintiff did not allow the animals at large on the highway has been put into the case.[62]

Where the defense is contributory negligence in allowing stock to run at large in a city, an ordinance prohibiting stock from running at large is admissible on the part of defendant,[63] and evidence is admissible on the part of plaintiff which would tend to establish that the stock was at large without his fault.[64] In an action for injury to animals while being driven over a crossing, evidence is admissible, as bearing on the issue of plaintiff's due care, of the speed of the train,[65] of experiments as to the extent of view from the crossing,[66] that plaintiff knew the time the train was due to pass, and that it had not passed,[67] and that signals were given at preceding crossings which plaintiff heard or might have heard in time to have kept the animals out of danger.[68]

In an action against a railroad company to recover for injury to an animal, the plaintiff must prove each and every essential element of his case by a preponderance of the evidence, and a preponderance of the evidence is sufficient

In an action against a railroad company to recover for injury to an animal, plaintiff must prove each and every essential element of his case by a preponderance of the evidence, and a preponderance of the evidence is sufficient.[69] Thus, there must be a preponderance of evidence to show that plaintiff was the owner of the animal injured,[70] to connect defendant with the injury complained of;[71] to show that defendant operated the road on which the injury occurred;[72] and to show that the servant of defendant whose act caused the injury was acting within the scope of his authority.[73]

In order to warrant a recovery by plaintiff there must be sufficient evidence to show that defendant was guilty of negligence, where the action is based on negligence,[74] and, ordinarily, it is not sufficient for plaintiff merely to show the fact of injury,[75] or the fact of injury and also the omission of some statutory duty without any evidence tending to show that such omission was the cause of the injury.[76] However, where the facts raise a presumption of negligence and there is no rebuttal offered by defendant,[77] or where the rebuttal offered is not sufficient,[78] plaintiff may establish his right to recover by proof of ownership and value of the animal and of its being injured or killed by act of defendant without offering further evidence of negligence.

Experiments. In the absence of evidence that conditions surrounding the accident and conditions at the making of a test or experiment were the same, the testimony as to the making of the test, if competent at all, is without substantial weight or effect.[79]

§ 656. —— Where Statutory Presumption of Negligence Rebutted

The rule requiring a preponderance of the evidence establishing the negligence of the defendant applies especially where the defendant by its evidence has temporarily rebutted the presumption of negligence which, under some statutes, follows from the fact of killing of, or injury to, an animal.

The rule requiring a preponderance of the evidence establishing the negligence of defendant applies especially where defendant by its evidence has temporarily rebutted the presumption of negligence which, under some statutes, follows from the fact of killing of, or injury to, an animal,[80] or where the facts with respect to the killing are all put in evidence.[81] However, circumstantial evidence of defendant's negligence in support of the presumption may be sufficient to sustain a judgment for plaintiff,[82] especially where the presumption has not been fully rebutted by defendant's evidence,[83] or where evidence in rebuttal contradicts itself.[84]

§ 657. —— Direct and Circumstantial Evidence

The facts necessary to sustain a recovery in an action against a railroad company for injury to an animal may be established by proof of circumstances from which they may be reasonably inferred by the jury as well as by direct testimony.

The facts necessary to sustain a recovery in an action against a railroad company for injury to an animal may be established by proof of circumstances from which they may be reasonably inferred by the jury as well as by direct testimony,[85] and plaintiff's case may be strongly fortified by the failure of defendant to introduce the testimony of its servants who were present at the accident.[86] However, in order to sustain a verdict on circumstantial evidence, there must be some connection between the facts proved and the fact at issue,[87] and the circumstances must be sufficiently strong and connected to create more than a mere conjecture or suspicion.[88] While it has been held that the circumstances shown must negative every other reasonable hypothesis save that of the negligence of defendant,[89] it has also been held that proof of the more probable hypothesis is all that is required.[90]

Although, where the only direct testimony as to the circumstances of the injury is that of defendant's servants who testify positively that there was no negligence, and they are not in any way contradicted or discredited, a verdict for plaintiff may not be sustained,[91] where there is evidence contradicting the testimony of defendant's servants, a verdict for plaintiff may stand,[92] even where the contradicting evidence is circumstantial and the evidence of the servants is direct.[93]

The rules as to the sufficiency of circumstantial evidence to support a recovery by plaintiff against a railroad company for injury to an animal have been applied to proof of the ownership of the animal injured,[94] the giving of notice of the injury to defendant,[95] the failure of defendant to post notices of the killing,[96] and the fact of negligence on the part of defendant[97]

Ordinarily, in an action against a railroad company to recover for injury to an animal, there must be a preponderance of evidence on behalf of the plaintiff to show that the injury complained of was caused by an instrumentality of the defendant, that it was the negligent act of the defendant which caused the injury and not an unavoidable accident, and that the defendant could have reasonably foreseen the injury.

Ordinarily, in an action against a railroad company to recover for injury to an animal, there must be a preponderance of evidence on behalf of plaintiff to show that the injury complained of was caused by an instrumentality of defendant,[98] that it was the negligent act of defendant which caused the injury[99] and not an unavoidable accident,[1] and that defendant could have reasonably foreseen the injury[2] On the other hand, under a statute creating a presumption of negligence on the part of a railroad company for the killing or injuring of stock by it, in order that defendant may prevail the evidence must be sufficient to show that the injury complained of was not the result of the negligence of defendant.[3]

The fact that an animal was killed or injured by being struck by defendant's cars or locomotives may be proved by circumstantial evidence without the direct testimony of any eyewitness,[4] and it is sufficient to show circumstances from which this fact may be fairly and justly inferred,[5] such as the position of the animal,[6] the character of the injury,[7] the presence of blood or hair on the road[8] or locomotive,[9] hoofprints of the animal,[10] and any marks on the track or roadbed indicating that an animal had been struck or dragged by the train[11] Moreover, these circumstances may be of such a character as to warrant the jury, without any direct evidence on the part of plaintiff, in disregarding the positive testimony of defendant's servants that the animal was not injured by the train.[12]

On the other hand, there is no preponderance of evidence for plaintiff where the circumstances shown are equally consistent with some other cause of injury for which the railroad is not responsible,[13] and, where defendant's servants testify positively that no animal was struck and their testimony is not contradicted and the circumstantial evidence is not inconsistent therewith, the jury may not disregard their testimony.[14] Collision with a train is not sufficiently proved by merely showing that the animal was found dead or injured near the track without any signs of violence or indications of having been struck by a train,[15] since there must be substantial facts shown from which it may be reasonably inferred that the animal was killed by the train.[16]

In order to sustain a recovery for the killing of an animal by a railroad company, there must be some evidence of its value, which must be of its actual or market value and not merely what the plaintiff considers it worth to him.

In order to sustain a recovery for the killing of an animal by a railroad company, there must be some evidence of its value,[17] which must be of its actual or market value and not merely what plaintiff considers it worth to him.[18] However, a verdict for the amount testified to by a single witness, if competent to testify as to the value of the animal killed, has been held justified.[19] Also, the fact that a dog killed by defendant's train was not assessed has been held not to prove that it was of no value,[20] especially where the undisputed evidence shows that the dog was valuable.[21]

Ordinarily, where an animal is merely injured, there must be evidence of its value after as well as before the injury,[22] and the evidence should be directed to a time immediately after the injury.[23] Although where the evidence merely shows that an animal was injured and there is no evidence as to whether it subsequently died, a judgment for its full value may not be sustained,[24] evidence that an employee, authorized by defendant to do so, took charge of the injured animal and subsequently killed it, may justify a verdict for the full value of the animal killed,[25] and plaintiff may not be required further to prove in dollars and cents the extent of the injury inflicted by the train.[26]

§ 660. —— Place of Injury; Venue

Under some statutory provisions, in order that the plaintiff may recover from a railroad company for killing or injuring an animal, the evidence must be sufficient to show that the accident occurred in the township where the action is brought or in an adjoining township.

Under some statutory provisions, in order that plaintiff may recover from a railroad company for killing or injuring an animal, the evidence must be sufficient to show that the accident occurred in the township where the action is brought or in an adjoining township,[27] and conflicting testimony of two witnesses placing the point of injury in different townships may not be sufficient to support a recovery, in the absence of evidence that the two townships named are adjoining.[28] Moreover, proof that the accident occurred in a well-known incorporated town, from which it is argued that the township in which the animal was killed may be inferred or judicially known, has been held insufficient, under such a statute.[29]

Although it has been held that a verdict for defendant is required where the evidence fails to show the county where the injury complained of occurred,[30] a verdict or finding that the injury occurred in the county in which the action to recover therefor is brought may be sufficiently supported by evidence that the injury was received in a town which a railroad map places within that county,[31] or within the statutory limits of a town which the statute places in that county,[32] or at a point located as being a certain distance and direction from a town and which point the court, by taking judicial notice of the geographical lines of the county, can place therein.[33]

§ 661. —— Fences and Cattle Guards

a. In general
b. Nature and cause of injury
c. Place of entry on track

a. In General

In an action against a railroad company to recover for injury to an animal resulting from a violation by the company of a statute requiring such a company to fence its tracks, the plaintiff must prove each and every element of his case by a preponderance of the evidence, and this rule applies to an action to recover for an injury resulting from the defective condition of a fence or cattle guard maintained by a railroad company.

In an action against a railroad company to recover for injury to an animal resulting from a violation by the company of a statute requiring such a company to fence its tracks, plaintiff must prove each and every element of his case by a preponderance of the evidence,[34] and this rule applies to an action to recover for an injury resulting from the defective condition of a fence or cattle guard maintained by a railroad company.[35] Thus, in order to sustain a recovery by plaintiff, it has been held that there must be sufficient evidence to show that the road was not fenced as required by statute,[36] and that, if the statute only requires fencing or cattle guards at certain places or excepts certain places, the evidence must be sufficient to show that the place in question was one required to be fenced,[37] or to be protected by cattle guards,[38] or that the place in question was not one of the places excepted by statute.[39]

Under a statute allowing a certain time after the road is in operation for the construction of fences, the evidence must be sufficient to show that such road was in operation,[40] and that the statutory time had elapsed[41] at the time of the injury complained of. Under some statutory provisions, a prima facie case for plaintiff may be made out by proof of plaintiff's ownership of the animal in question, the injury, and a failure to fence at the place in question, as discussed supra § 642, and an imputation of negligence made under such a statute may be strengthened by other evidence adduced in the case.[42] Where plaintiff has made out a prima facie case under such a statute, the railroad company may be required to prove lack of negligence on its part by a preponderance of the evidence in order to escape liability.[43]

Evidence indicating that plaintiff's mules entered on defendant's unfenced track in plain sight of train crew and traveled down track a certain number of feet before being struck and killed by train and that train crew made no effort to slow or stop train went beyond imputation of negligence flowing from proof of killing of livestock by train and made out a strong prima facie case against defendant.—Cathey v. Defective condition; notice of defect. In order that plaintiff may recover for injury to an animal resulting from the defective condition of railroad fences or cattle guards, the evidence must be sufficient to show the defective condition of the fence[44] or cattle guard,[45] that such condition existed at the time of the injury,[46] that the animal came on the track at the defective place, as discussed infra subdivision c of this section, and, where the defect is not in the original construction, that the company had either actual or constructive notice thereof,[47] although proof of actual notice may not be necessary where facts are shown from which it appears that the defect had existed for such time or under such circumstances as to charge the company with constructive notice thereof[48]

b. Nature and Cause of Injury

In order to justify a recovery under a fencing statute, there must be sufficient evidence to show that the cause of the injury to the plaintiff's animal was the breach by the defendant of its statutory duty with respect to fences or cattle guards.

In order to justify a recovery under a fencing statute, there must be sufficient evidence to show that the cause of the injury to plaintiff's animal was the breach by defendant of its statutory duty with respect to fences[49] or cattle guards,[50] and, where the evidence shows that the injury complained of was caused by an unavoidable accident, there can be no recovery.[51]

While it may be shown by circumstantial as well as by direct evidence that the animal in question was injured by a direct collision with,[52] or by being frightened by,[53] the locomotive or train of defendant, in order to sustain a verdict for plaintiff on circumstantial evidence alone, the circumstances shown must have some connection with the facts in issue, and must not be equally consistent with some other theory as to the cause of the injury complained of, under which defendant would not be liable,[54] as where the evidence discloses merely that the animal was injured,[55] or that it had been injured on a cattle guard,[56] or that it was found tangled in a wire fence,[57] or that it had fallen from a bridge[58] or into a hole.[59]

c. Place of Entry on Track

In actions based on the statutory liability of a railroad company for its failure properly to fence, in order that the plaintiff may succeed there must be sufficient evidence to show that the animal in question came on the track at a place where the railroad company was required to fence or to maintain cattle guards, or at a place where the fence or cattle guard was defective.

guards,[60] or at a place where the fence or cattle guard was defective.[61] This need not be shown by direct testimony but may be established by circumstantial evidence,[62] such as by the condition of the fence[63] or of the cattle guard,[64] or by hoofprints,[65] or other marks or circumstances indicating that the animal entered at such place,[66] and proof that an animal which was not breachy entered on the track over a fence that was generally insecure may obviate the necessity of showing that it was insecure at the particular point where the animal entered.[67]

The circumstantial evidence may be sufficiently strong to sustain a finding that the animal came on the track at a place where the railroad company was required to fence or to maintain cattle guards notwithstanding the positive testimony of defendant's servants that it was at a public crossing or other place not required to be fenced,[68] as, for example, the hoofprints or position of the animal at a distance from the public crossing,[69] particularly where other facts are shown discrediting their testimony in other respects as to the circumstances of the injury.[70]

On the other hand, a verdict for plaintiff may not be sustained in the absence of all evidence as to whether the animal came on the track through a break in the fence or from a neighboring crossing,[71] or through an open gate for which defendant was not responsible,[72] or where defendant's servants testify positively that the animal came on the track at a public crossing or depot and their testimony is not impeached or contradicted by plaintiff's witnesses or by circumstantial evidence.[73]

In order to sustain a recovery for injury to an animal on the ground of the defective condition of a railroad crossing, there must be sufficient evidence, either direct or circumstantial, to show the existence of a defective condition in the crossing.

In order to sustain a recovery for injury to an animal on the ground of the defective condition of a railroad crossing, there must be sufficient evidence, either direct or circumstantial, to show the existence of a defective condition in the crossing.[74] Where an animal is injured by coming on a railroad through a defective or open gate, a verdict for plaintiff may be supported by evidence, direct or circumstantial, that the gate was defective[75] or not up to the statutory standard,[76] or that the gate had been opened by servants or agents of defendant,[77] or that it had been open for a sufficient length of time before the accident to charge the railroad with notice.[78] However, a verdict for plaintiff may not be sustained where there is no evidence as to the defectiveness of the gate,[79] or as to how it came to be open,[80] or, where it is not claimed that defendant's servants opened the gate or had actual notice of its condition, that it had been open for such length of time as to charge the company with notice.[81] So, too, a verdict for plaintiff may not be sustained on proof of the defective condition of a gate where there is no evidence that the animal injured passed through the gate.[82]

support a finding of negligence on the part of a railroad company to show merely the speed of the train at the time of the injury complained of, or to show merely that the train was running faster than its usual rate of speed, or to show that the usual rate of speed was not reduced on approaching an ordinary public crossing in open country.

Ordinarily, in the absence of a statutory or municipal regulation otherwise providing, it is not sufficient to support a finding of negligence on the part of a railroad company to show merely the speed of the train at the time of the injury complained of,[83] or to show merely that the train was running faster than its usual rate of speed,[84] or to show that the usual rate of speed was not reduced on approaching an ordinary public crossing in open country.[85]

On the other hand, proof that the train was running at a high rate of speed under circumstances known to defendant's servants, making a greater degree of precaution necessary, may justify a finding of negligence on the part of the railroad company,[86] and the evidence may be sufficient to show that due care under the circumstances required a relatively slow and careful operation of the train at the time of the accident,[87] and that the running of the train at an unusual rate of speed and without warning of its approach constituted negligence.[88] Also, where the issue is merely as to whether the speed of the train was in excess of that allowed by a statute or ordinance, evidence that the train was running "very fast" may justify a finding that it was running at a greater rate of speed than the statutory rate where the statutory rate may reasonably be held not fast,[89] especially where such evidence is strongly corroborated by the physical circumstances of the case.[90]

§ 664. —— Precautions; Signals and Lookouts

a. In general

b. Lookout

c. Signals

a. In General

In order to sustain a recovery by the plaintiff on the ground that the defendant failed to take proper precautions to avoid injuring the animal or animals in question, the evidence must be sufficient to show a failure of duty on the part of the defendant in this respect.

In order to sustain a recovery by plaintiff on the ground that defendant failed to take proper precautions to avoid injuring the animal or animals in question, the evidence must be sufficient to show a failure of duty on the part of defendant in this respect,[91] such as a failure of the servants of defendant to exercise proper care to avoid injuring such animals where they saw the animals or knew them to be on or near the track,[92] and evidence that a train running rapidly was heard to give stock signals has been held insufficient of itself to show that the animals in question were on the track a sufficient length of time to enable the servants of defendant to avoid the accident.[93] Also, where there is no evidence as to when the animal came on the track, the mere fact that at the place where it was killed an animal could have been seen for a sufficient distance to stop the train has been held not sufficient to show negligence on the part of the servants of defendant.[94]

The evidence, on the other hand, may be sufficient to sustain a finding that the servants of defendant took all possible steps to avoid the accident,[95] and defendant may be absolved from the charge of negligence where the evidence is sufficient to show that the train, despite the efforts of the operator, could not be stopped before hitting the animal in question.[96] Thus, while a verdict for plaintiff may be warranted, even though defendant's engineer testifies that everything possible was done to avoid the accident, if there are facts admitted by him or testified to by others which make the correctness of his opinion fairly disputable,[97] where the servants of defendant testify positively that there was no negligence or that under the circumstances the injury was unavoidable and they are not impeached or contradicted by plaintiff's witness or by the circumstances of the case, a judgment for plaintiff may not be sustained.[98]

Headlight. Evidence of a failure on the part of defendant to provide a proper headlight in good condition, and that the animal in question could have been seen in time to avoid the accident if there had been a proper headlight, may be sufficient to support a verdict against defendant,[99] but not where it appears that the accident would have been unavoidable even with a headlight in good condition.[1]

b. Lookout

In order that the plaintiff may recover on the ground that the servants of the defendant failed to maintain a proper lookout, the evidence must be sufficient to show a breach of duty on their part with respect to maintaining a proper lookout, as well as that such breach of duty was the cause of the accident in question.

In order that plaintiff may recover on the ground that the servants of defendant failed to maintain a proper lookout, the evidence must be sufficient to show a breach of duty on their part with respect to maintaining a proper lookout,[2] as well as that such breach of duty was the cause of the accident in question,[3] and evidence of weather conditions at the time of the accident may be such as to warrant a finding that the servants of defendant were prevented from discovering the animal on the track in time to avoid hitting it.[4] A finding of negligence on the part of defendant in failing to maintain a proper lookout may, on the other hand, be sustained by evidence sufficient to show that the servants of defendant, in the exercise of ordinary care, could have discovered the animal in question on the tracks in time to avoid injuring it,[5] as in a case where it is shown that the animal could have been seen for a sufficient distance within which to stop the train, provided it is also shown that the animal was on the track for the time required for the train to go that distance,[6] and where, if the evidence of conditions of light and weather are conflicting, there is evidence sufficient to support a finding that conditions were such as not to obstruct the engineer's sight.[7]

c. Signals

In determining whether or not a proper signal was given by the servants of the defendant, purely negative testimony of witnesses that they did not hear a signal is entitled to little weight if the witnesses were not paying attention to the train or were a considerable distance away at the time

In determining whether or not a proper signal was given by the servants of defendant, purely negative testimony of witnesses that they did not hear a signal is entitled to little weight, particularly if the witnesses were not paying any attention to the train or were a considerable distance away at the time,[8] and such evidence is entitled to much less weight than positive testimony of competent witnesses for defendant that such signals were given.[9] However, where the attention of a witness was directed to the train at the time or the circumstances were such that he would naturally have heard the signal, his negative testimony may be entitled to greater weight and, in the absence of contradictory testimony of the servants of defendant, may be sufficient to sustain a finding of negligence in this regard.[10] If plaintiff's witnesses testify positively that a signal was not given, a finding to this effect may be sustained, although defendant's servants in charge of the train testify

Evidence sufficient to rebut presumption of negligence

Where the killing of an animal is fully explained by the uncontradicted and undiscredited evidence of a servant of defendant, showing that it was impossible to see the animal in time to save it, the presumption of negligence arising from the accident is rebutted.—Georgia Railroad & Banking Co. v. to the contrary,[11] and, a fortiori, where defendant's servants testify as to the duty to signal and their failure to recall whether or not it was done,[12] or where they testify that it was not done[13]

In order to justify a recovery by plaintiff on the ground of a failure on the part of defendant to give a required signal the evidence must be sufficient to show that such failure of duty on the part of defendant was the cause of the injury complained of.[14] However, under some statutory provisions the burden is on defendant to show by sufficient evidence that its failure to signal did not cause the injury complained of,[15] and, by virtue of some statutes, evidence that signals were not given may be sufficient to warrant an inference that, if they had been given, the animals would not have been struck.[16] Moreover, it has been held that in order to entitle plaintiff to recover because of a failure to signal on the part of defendant an affirmative showing that the servants of defendant discovered the animal in question on the track in time to avoid the injury complained of is not essential to establish the proximate cause of the accident.[17]

In an action against a railroad company for injuries to animals, the party who has the burden of proof as to contributory negligence must adduce sufficient evidence to meet such burden.

In actions against railroad companies to recover for injuries to animals, the party who has the burden of proof as to contributory negligence, must adduce sufficient evidence to meet such burden.[18] Thus contributory negligence of the owner barring his right to recover for injury to his animal may be sufficiently shown by evidence that plaintiff, or his servant, failed to stop, look, and listen before driving his animals on the crossing,[19] or was in the habit of doing so, notwithstanding warnings, at the time a train usually passed,[20] or was using his horses in work on the track at a time when he knew a train was scheduled to pass[21]

On the other hand, evidence of a failure to look and listen in driving a horse over a crossing may not justify direction of verdict for defendant where it is shown that the crossing was passed in safety, and that the injury to the horse resulted from its backing into the train afterward against the efforts of its owner to prevent it[22] Moreover, evidence that plaintiff did look and listen before driving cattle over the crossing has been held sufficient to support a finding for him on that issue.[23] Also, contributory negligence has been held not conclusively proved by the fact that plaintiff left his horse or team unhitched and unattended in the vicinity of a railroad track,[24] or by the fact that plaintiff placed a carload of cattle overnight in a pasture, closing the gate and fastening it with a hook but not using a slide board with which he was unfamiliar.[25]

§ 666. —— Willful, Wanton, or Gross Negligence

Willful, wanton, or gross negligence, when it is an element of the case against a railroad company for injuries to animals, must be established by a preponderance of the evidence.

circumstances indicating that the injury was avoidable may justify a finding of wanton and gross negligence against a railroad company,[27] testimony of the engineer, uncontradicted by direct testimony or circumstances, that he did not willfully intend to injure the animal is not sufficient to support a verdict based on willful injury.[28] Moreover, evidence that the engineer gave no particular attention to animals in an adjoining pasture is not sufficient to support a verdict based on a charge of gross negligence, where it appears that on first realizing the danger to the animals he made reasonable efforts to avoid collision,[29] or where it is shown that, when danger was first apparent, collision was unavoidable.[30]

A judgment for recovery of damages for injury to a trespassing animal is not supported by the uncontradicted testimony of the engineer that he did not see the animal before striking it,[31] or by evidence of negligent operation of a train in the absence of further evidence of willful injury or reckless disregard for the safety of others.[32] Likewise, evidence of a straight track for a considerable distance and excessive speed will not support a verdict for the owner of an animal pastured on the railroad right of way under a contract exempting the railroad from liability for negligent injury.[33]

§ 667. Conduct of Trial in General

With respect to actions against railroad companies for injuries to animals, questions of law and fact are discussed infra §§ 668–678; instructions, infra §§ 679–685; and the verdict, findings, and judgment infra § 686.

§ 668. Questions of Law and Fact

In an action against a railroad company for injury to animals, questions of law should be determined by the court and issues of fact by the jury.

In an action against a railroad company to recover for injury to animals, questions of law should be determined by the court[34] and issues of fact by the jury.[35] Thus, the case should be submitted to the jury whenever there is any evidence from which they might justifiably find the existence of a material fact in issue,[36] or where the evidence is conflicting or of such a character that different conclusions as to a fact in issue may reasonably be drawn therefrom.[37] However, whether there is any competent evidence is a question for the court,[38] and an issue should not be submitted to the jury where there is no evidence to support it,[39] or where there is insufficient evidence to support it,[40] or where the evidence is legally insufficient to sustain a verdict if rendered,[41] and, if the evidence is not conflicting and is of such a character that only one inference may be drawn therefrom, the court should, and it is not error when it

§ 669. —— Fact of Killing or Injury by Train

If there is any evidence reasonably tending to show that the animal in question was killed or injured by one of the defendant's trains, that issue should be submitted to the jury wherever the evidence is conflicting or affords reasonable ground for conflicting opinions.

If there is any evidence reasonably tending to show that the animal in question was killed or injured by one of defendant's trains, that issue should be submitted to the jury wherever the evidence is conflicting or affords reasonable ground for conflicting opinions.[43] This rule has been applied to the determination of whether the death or injury was caused by defendant's train on some evidence of the animal's being seen near the track at the time the train passed,[44] of the animal's physical condition before the injury[45] or the nature of the injury considered separately or in connection with the finding of the animal afterward near the track,[46] the condition of near-by fences,[47] footprints,[48] hair or blood on track,[49] or other physical signs or conditions,[50] or by an absence of evidence of other possible causes.[51] In a jurisdiction where proof of the killing or injuring of the animals in question by defendant's train raises a presumption of negligence on the part of defendant, it has been held that, where defendant introduces evidence which clearly and undisputedly shows that it exercised due care and took every precaution to avoid the accident, the presumption does not authorize the submission of the issue of defendant's negligence to the jury.[52]

§ 670. —— Character and Condition of Public Crossing

In an action against a railroad company for injury to an animal at a public crossing, where the evidence is conflicting or different conclusions may reasonably be drawn therefrom, it is a question for the jury whether the crossing was constructed and maintained by defendant in a safe and proper condition, or whether a particular plan of construction is safe.

In an action against a railroad company for injury to an animal occurring at a public crossing, where the evidence is conflicting or different conclusions may reasonably be drawn therefrom, it is a question for the jury whether the crossing was constructed and maintained by defendant in a safe and proper condition,[53] or whether a particular plan of construction is safe.[54] However where there is no evidence of a defective condition, the issue is one for the court to determine.[55]

Whether defendant was guilty of negligence in the operation of its trains causing the injury to plaintiff's animals is ordinarily a question of fact for the jury.

character that different conclusions or inferences might reasonably be drawn therefrom,[59] and the weight of such evidence is a matter for their consideration.[60] Plaintiff is entitled to go to the jury on every element of negligence charged which there is evidence tending to support.[61]

On the other hand, the case should not be submitted to the jury if there is no evidence of negligence,[62] or if there is insufficient evidence of negligence to warrant a submission to the jury,[63] even though the evidence does tend to show that the injury was caused by the train,[64] or where the evidence is of such a character that a verdict if rendered would be set aside by the court and a new trial granted on the ground of the insufficiency of the evidence to support the verdict,[65] or where the facts are undisputed and the deductions or inferences to be drawn therefrom are undisputable.[66]

Where by statute proof of the injury raises a presumption of negligence which must be rebutted by the defendant, it is ordinarily a question for the jury, or for the trial court sitting without a jury, whether the defendant's evidence is sufficient to overcome the statutory presumption.

Where by statute proof of the injury raises a presumption of negligence which must be rebutted by defendant, it is ordinarily a question for the jury,[67] or for the trial court sitting without a jury,[68] whether defendant's evidence is sufficient to overcome the statutory presumption. While there is some authority to the contrary,[69] the rule followed in a majority of the states is that, where defendant introduces evidence which, if true, satisfactorily overcomes the presumption of negligence, and the evidence is uncontradicted by facts or testimony and the witnesses are unimpeached, the statutory presumption does not warrant the submission of the issue of negligence to the jury,[70] and, if the issue is submitted, a verdict for plaintiff is improper and will not be sustained,[71] even though the only witnesses for defendant are its employees,[72] and not all of them are called to testify,[73] and testimony of defendant's witnesses contradicted only by a mere expression of opinion on the part of plaintiff's witnesses may be regarded as uncontradicted testimony within the meaning of this rule.[74] However, the unexplained absence from the trial of either the engineer or fireman may be a consideration against any interference with a verdict for plaintiff.[75]

It becomes a question for the jury if the testimony of defendant's own witnesses fails to show that everything was done which might have been to avoid the accident.[76] Also, if the testimony of defendant's employees is inconsistent or improbable,[77] or is contradicted by the circumstances of the case,[78] or by testimony of the witnesses of plaintiff in rebuttal,[79] or if it discloses facts relating thereto from which the existence of the negligence alleged might reasonably be inferred,[80] or if, on the facts as established by undisputed testimony, there could reasonably be a difference of opinion as to the liability of defendant under the law,[81] the question is for the jury, and a verdict for plaintiff based on such conflicting evidence will not ordinarily be interfered with,[82] although plaintiff's evidence is entirely circumstantial,[83] small in amount,[84] and in itself, independently of the inference of negligence to be drawn from the killing, of weak probative value.[85] Where plaintiff's evidence overcomes the effect of a statutory inference of negligence on the part of defendant, an affirmative charge in favor of plaintiff is improper.[86]

e. Cause of injury under statute

a. In General

Particular issues involved in the determination of the liability of a railroad company for injury to animals under a fencing statute are for the jury to decide where the evidence thereon is conflicting or where the opinions as to inferences to be drawn therefrom may reasonably conflict.

Particular issues involved in the determination of the liability of a railroad company for injury to animals under a fencing statute are for the jury to decide where the evidence thereon is conflicting or where the opinions as to inferences to be drawn therefrom may reasonably conflict,[87] as, for example, whether the animal at the time it was killed was at a place which defendant was under legal obligation to fence,[88] or whether the animal was trespassing on adjoining land or on a highway when it entered defendant's right of way,[89] or whether it was running at large.[90] On the other hand, the liability of defendant under a fencing statute may, under the circumstances, be a question of law for the court,[91] as where the evidence is undisputed that the fence or cattle guard was required at the place of injury, that it was defective, and that because of the defect the animals came on the track and were injured.[92]

b. At What Places Required

Ordinarily the existence of conditions or surroundings justifying a failure on the part of a railroad company to erect and maintain a fence at a certain place is a question of fact for the jury.

Ordinarily the existence of conditions or surroundings justifying a failure on the part of a railroad company to erect and maintain a fence at a certain place is a question of fact for the jury.[93] Thus, where there is conflicting evidence or evidence reasonably affording ground for opposing opinions, it is for the jury to determine whether a railroad company could have placed cattle guards[94] or fences[95] at the place in question without endangering the lives of its employees engaged in switching and operating its trains, as, for example, at a way station infrequently used,[96] or whether, without endangering the safety of its employees, it could have located its cattle guards nearer to the head of its switch limits than was done.[97]

on grounds used for depot or switching purposes and that the limits of such grounds were reasonable, and that they could not have been fenced at the place of injury without interfering with the public convenience, the proper operation of the trains, or the safety of the employees of the company, the question as to the extent of such grounds should not be submitted to the jury,[98] and, if only one conclusion may be drawn, as where the evidence shows that the accident was so close to the station house that there is no question that it was included within the proper limits of defendant's station grounds, the court may properly direct a verdict for defendant.[99]

Where the company relies for its failure to fence on the existence of natural obstructions making a fence unnecessary, the question whether the obstructions are of such a character as to relieve the company from the duty of fencing ordinarily is one of fact for the jury.[1] Where the company is relieved from constructing cattle guards at a public crossing by reason of the fact that it is within its station grounds, it usually is a question for the jury whether the company has constructed them at the nearest point that would not interfere with the proper operation of the road and the convenience of the public;[2] and, where the place of the accident brings into controversy whether a particular area was used by the railroad as station grounds,[3] or by the public as a highway,[4] or the proper extent or limits of such places,[5] it is a question of fact for the jury whether the company has left unfenced more than the proper conduct of its business and the public use and convenience require However, where the law designates certain places to be fenced and other places not to be fenced, the obligation of a railroad company to fence its tracks at a particular point is a question of law for the court.[6]

c. At What Place Animal Entered

Where from the evidence it is uncertain where the animal injured came on the track, it is a question for the jury whether the place of entry was at a point where the defendant was obliged by law to fence.

Where from the evidence it is uncertain where the animal injured came on the track, it is a question for the jury whether the place of entry was at a point where defendant was obliged by law to fence,[7] or had failed to construct or properly maintain its fences or cattle guards,[8] or whether the animal entered through a gate or bars which it was the duty of defendant to keep closed[9] In order to warrant the submission of the case to the jury it is not necessary that there should be any direct evidence that the animal entered at such place, but it is sufficient if there are circumstances reasonably tending to show this fact,[10] as where the animal was killed or injured at a place where the company had neglected its duty to fence,[11] unless there is evidence uncontradicted that it entered at another place and through circumstances for which defendant was not responsible.[12]

d. Sufficiency, Defects, and Repairs

Where the undisputed evidence shows that the fence in question would not turn stock, the sufficiency of the fence is a question of law for the court, but ordinarily it is a question of fact for the jury whether a fence or cattle guard as constructed is reasonably sufficient for the purpose intended or whether a natural barrier serves that purpose

itself a source of danger,[16] as in the case of a barbed wire fence,[17] or a cattle guard so constructed as to attract rather than to turn cattle.[18]

Ordinarily, it is for the jury to determine whether a railroad company has exercised reasonable care in maintaining fences and cattle guards in a proper state of repair,[19] or whether or not the repairs needed were slight, placing liability therefor, under some statutory provisions, on the landowner.[20] Usually it is a question for the jury whether the company has been negligent in failing to discover defects,[21] or in failing sooner to repair the defects after discovery.[22] Also, what is a reasonable time sufficient to charge a railroad company with knowledge of defects,[23] or whether it is chargeable with notice by reason of its failure to complete a construction job within a reasonable time necessitating an opening in a fence,[24] usually is a question for the jury However, where there is no evidence of defendant's knowledge, actual or constructive, that a fence was out of repair,[25] or where the evidence is such that only a single inference on the issue involved may reasonably be drawn,[26] the question is for the court.

Removal of snow and ice. Negligence of a railroad company in the removal of snow and ice from cattle guards is usually a question of fact for the jury depending on circumstances of location of the road, the position and condition of the cattle guard, prevailing storms, weather conditions, and other relevant facts.[27] Even in jurisdictions where it is held that, because of the severity of the winters, reasonable care and diligence do not require a railroad company to remove the natural accumulations of snow and ice from its cattle guards, the conditions may be such as to make the question of negligence one of fact for the jury.[28]

e. Cause of Injury under Statute

Ordinarily, it is for the jury to decide whether the killing or injury of the animal in question was caused either by defendant's failure to fence as required by statute or by the insufficiency of the fence.

Ordinarily, it is for the jury to decide whether the killing or injury of the animal in question was caused either by defendant's failure to fence as required by statute,[29] or by the insufficiency of the fence[30] Under statutes making a railroad company liable for failure to fence only in case of injuries due to actual collision with a train, it is for the court to decide whether there is no evidence that the injury was caused by collision,[31] or by negligence other than the failure to fence[32] However, where there is any circumstantial evidence from which a collision may reasonably be inferred, it is for the jury to decide whether the injury was so caused.[33]

§ 674. —— Private Crossings, Gates, and Bars

It is generally a question for the jury whether the gates or bars in a railroad fence are sufficient, whether the railroad company has exercised proper care in keeping them in repair and in keeping them closed, and, where the injury is caused by their being left open, whether they had been open for sufficient time to charge the company with notice of their condition.

It is generally a question for the jury whether the gates or bars in a railroad fence are sufficient,[34] whether the railroad company has exercised proper care in keeping them in repair[35] and in keeping them closed,[36] and, where the injury is caused by their being left open, whether they had been open for sufficient time to charge the company with notice of their condition.[37] So, where a railroad company has knowledge that its gate is left open customarily and it fails to take steps to correct the situation, a verdict for plaintiff may be authorized.[38]

On the other hand, where there is no evidence that the gate in question was unchained for a sufficient time before the accident for the railroad company to discover the situation and remedy it, the question of the negligence of the company in this respect should not be submitted to the jury,[39] and, where the time intervening between leaving the gate open and the escape of the animal through it is so short as to admit of only one opinion on the issue, the court must declare as matter of law that there was no negligence in failing to discover it.[40] Also evidence concerning the inadequacy of the fastening devices of the gate may be insufficient to warrant a submission of the negligence of defendant with respect thereto to the jury.[41]

§ 675. —— Signals, Lookouts, and Precautions

Whether the defendant was negligent with respect to giving the proper signals, keeping a proper lookout, or taking the proper precautions to avoid injuries to animals ordinarily is a question for the jury.

It is ordinarily a question for the jury whether, under the circumstances, defendant was negligent with respect to keeping a proper lookout for animals,[42] and the case should be submitted to the jury whenever there is any evidence from which it might reasonably be inferred that, if a proper lookout had been maintained, the animal could have been seen in time to avoid the injury.[43] Usually it is a question for the jury whether, under the circumstances, defendant was negligent in failing to take proper precautions to avoid the injury after the animal was discovered on or near the track,[44] or whether or not there was opportunity to take such precautions.[45] However, the issue is one for the court where the evidence is such as clearly to show that all proper precautions were taken by defendant,[46] or where the undisputed evidence conclusively proves that the collision could not have been avoided.[47]

Ordinarily, the necessity for the sounding of warning signals by defendant,[48] the point at which, if reasonably required, they should have been initiated,[49] and their efficacy, if given,[50] are questions for the jury. It is usually a question for the jury whether or not defendant's servants sounded the alarm whistle when an animal was seen on or near the track,[51] or whether under the circumstances they were negligent in failing to sound the alarm whistle at such time,[52] or whether the failure to do so is sufficiently excused;[53] or whether defendant's servants were negligent in sounding the alarm whistle under the circumstances;[54] or whether they were negligent in failing to stop or slacken the speed of a train;[55] or in not attempting to stop sooner than was done,[56] or in increasing speed to avoid a rear end collision with another train.[57]

crossing signals is ordinarily a question for the jury.[58] So, where the evidence is conflicting, it is a question for the jury whether the crossing signals were given,[59] or the alarm whistle sounded,[60] although plaintiff's evidence is of a negative character, provided plaintiff's witness was in a position to have heard the signal if it had been given.[61]

While the evidence may be such as not to warrant the submission to the jury of the question whether the defendant was operating its train at the time of the injury complained of at a speed which was so excessive or reckless as to constitute negligence, ordinarily whether defendant was negligent in this respect is a question of fact for the jury.

While the evidence may be such as not to warrant the submission to the jury of the question whether defendant was operating its train at the time of the injury complained of at a speed which was so excessive or reckless as to constitute negligence,[62] ordinarily whether defendant was negligent in this respect is a question of fact for the jury.[63] Thus, whether defendant was negligent in operating at a high speed in rounding a curve,[64] or while traveling through a town,[65] or over a stretch of track where animals were in the habit of grazing on the right of way,[66] usually is for the jury to determine. Also, whether defendant was negligent in operating its train in violation of a speed ordinance is for the jury,[67] especially where it is in evidence that such an ordinance has been violated and it is held that such violation is prima facie evidence of negligence.[68]

Whether the owner of the animal injured has been guilty of contributory negligence is ordinarily a question of fact for the jury, and it becomes a question of law where, and only where, the evidence is undisputed and so clear that only one conclusion may reasonably be drawn therefrom.

Whether the owner of the animal injured has been guilty of contributory negligence is ordinarily a question of fact for the jury,[69] and it becomes a question of law where, and only where, the evidence on the issue is undisputed and so clear that only one conclusion may reasonably be drawn therefrom.[70] So, the owner's due care is a question for the jury where the evidence is conflicting,[71] or where reasonable minds may arrive at different conclusions as to that issue.[72]

It usually is a question for the jury whether, under the circumstances, plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence in leaving a team unhitched and unattended near a railroad track,[73] in driving animals over a railroad crossing,[74] in failing to stop, look, and listen for trains before driving animals on a railroad crossing,[75] or in driving a team and leading a horse while crossing the track.[76] It is also, as a rule, for the jury to determine whether plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence in driving horses loose along a road near a railroad track;[77] in turning an animal loose in the vicinity of a railroad track where it is unfenced,[78] or where the railroad fence was known to be defective and without notifying the railroad company of the existence of such defect,[79] or into an inclosure near a railroad track where the fence about the inclosure is defective,[80] or in turning animals loose near station grounds which the company is not required to fence.[81]

Whether plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence in failing to prevent animals from straying on the railroad track, where allowing animals to stray at large does not constitute a violation of a statute or ordinance,[82] in permitting animals to run at large in violation of law,[83] or in particularly dangerous places;[84] and where that issue is raised, whether the owner knew of the danger,[85] usually is for the jury to determine. Moreover, where, by statute, a railroad company is liable, in case of a failure to fence, unless the injury was occasioned by the "willful act" of the owner himself, it is ordinarily a question for the jury whether a given act is willful or otherwise.[86]

Although a railroad company may have been negligent in the operation of its trains or in doing or omitting some act prohibited or required by statute, ordinarily it is a question for the jury whether such negligent act or omission was the proximate cause of the injury complained of.

Although a railroad company may have been negligent in the operation of its trains or in doing or omitting some act prohibited or required by statute, ordinarily it is a question for the jury whether such negligent act or omission was the proximate cause of the injury complained of.[87] So it generally is a question for the jury whether the injury was caused by a train being operated at a high or unusual rate of speed[88] or at a speed in violation of a statute or ordinance,[89] or whether the injury was caused by a failure on the part of defendant to give warning signals[90] or to sound an alarm signal,[91] or to give crossing signals.[92]

It is, as a rule, a question for the jury whether the injury was caused by a failure on the part of defendant to keep a proper lookout,[93] by a failure to apply the brakes[94] or to stop the train sooner,[95] or by a failure to construct fences or cattle guards as required by law[96] or to maintain them in a proper state of repair.[97] Usually it is for the jury to determine whether the injury was caused by the negligent construction on the part of defendant of a highway crossing[98] or of a bridge at the crossing,[99] or by an unprotected and dangerous wall on the right of way of defendant.[1] Where the injury resulted from the animal getting to the track through an open gate, the cause of the gate being open is usually, on the evidence, a question of fact for the jury.[2]

On the other hand, it has been held that, where an action is brought to recover for the death of an animal which was merely injured by the negligent act of a railroad company, the question whether the act was the proximate cause of the death is one of law for the court in the absence of proof that the injury received was the cause of the death.[3]

§ 679. Instructions

a. In general
b. Invading province of jury

a. In General

The general rules applicable to instructions in civil actions apply to instructions in actions against railroad companies for injuries to animals.

The general rules applicable to instructions in civil actions apply to instructions in actions against railroad companies for injuries to animals.[4] So the instructions must be sufficiently full and specific properly to serve as a guide to the jury in determining the case,[5] must state the law correctly,[6] must apply the law to the facts,[7] and must be based on all the evidence.[8] Also the instructions must not be confusing or misleading,[9] argumentative,[10] or contradictory.[11] Moreover, the instructions must not assume the existence of facts not in evidence,[12] intimate an opinion on the merits of the case,[13] or submit to the jury the determination of questions of law.[14]

The instructions must not impose on defendant a higher degree of care and diligence than the rule of ordinary care which the law requires[15] or restrict defendant's right to defenses open to it under the law.[16] In stating the conditions authorizing a recovery, the instructions should not omit any essential element necessary to establish plaintiff's cause of action,[17] such as that the negligence shown must have been the proximate cause of the injury,[18] unless, in view of the evidence, if defendant was in fact negligent, there is no question that such negligence was the proximate cause of the injury.[19] The instructions should not, on the other hand, authorize a verdict for defendant on a finding that certain duties were properly performed to the exclusion of other grounds of liability involved in the case.[20]

Requested instructions which state the law correctly as to material issues which there is evidence tending to support should be given,[21] but the refusal of such instructions is not error where they are covered by the general charge given,[22] or are confusing and misleading,[23] or do not state a correct proposition of law,[24] or are bad in form.[25] Instructions which have no purpose other than to aid the jury in weighing the evidence are largely discretionary with the court, and, where the court may rightfully consider such instructions unnecessary, it will not be held error to refuse them.[26]

Inexactness of phrasing will not invalidate an instruction provided, as given and when considered with the evidence, it states a correct rule of law, and is in a form to be correctly understood by the jury,[27] but if the inexactness results in an inaccurate statement of the rule the instruction will be held erroneous in law.[28]

Damages. Where there is evidence as to the value of the animal at different times, it is error if the instructions fail to restrict the damages to its value at the time of the injury[29] or if they permit the jury to include improper elements of damage[30]

b. Invading Province of Jury

The instructions of the court must not invade the province of the jury.

The instructions of the court must not invade the province of the jury,[31] as by telling them that certain acts do or do not constitute negligence[32] Thus instructions must not assume the existence of material facts in issue[33] unless established by undisputed evidence.[34] Instructions must not draw inferences of fact from the evidence[35] or pass on the credibility of witnesses or the weight of evidence[36]

§ 680. —— Conformity to Issues and Evidence

The instructions must conform to, and be limited by, the issues made by the pleadings and the evidence

The instructions must conform to, and be limited by, the issues made by the pleadings and the evidence,[37] and it is error to submit to the jury issues not presented by the pleadings[38] or not supported by the evidence[39] Although an issue of fact not in dispute between the parties need not be presented to the jury,[40] material matter properly presented by the pleadings and the evidence should be submitted to the jury,[41] and it is error for the court to withdraw it from them,[42] and a request for an instruction having that effect is properly refused.[43] On the other hand, it is error for the court to refuse to instruct the jury, if requested, that, where particular acts of negligence or a particular ground of liability is alleged, there can be no recovery on other grounds.[44]

§ 681. —— Presumptions and Burden of Proof

a. In general
b. From proof of injury under statute

a. In General

The court should correctly instruct the jury on the law as to presumptions and burden of proof and in terms which will not confuse or mislead them.

The court should correctly instruct the jury on the law as to presumptions and burden of proof[45] and in terms which will not confuse or mislead them[46] The instruction need not refer in express terms to the burden of proof if it is so worded that the jury cannot fail to understand the law on the subject,[47] as where the instruction states the rule in terms referring to the credibility of plaintiff's and defendant's witnesses.[48]

b. From Proof of Injury under Statute

Where, by statute, proof of the injury is prima facie evidence of negligence on the part of a railroad company, it is proper to instruct the jury that, if they are satisfied by a preponderance of the evidence of the fact of injury by the defendant's train, the defendant is prima facie negligent, and that the burden is on the defendant to show facts exculpating it from liability.

Where, by statute, proof of the injury is prima facie evidence of negligence on the part of a railroad company, it is proper to instruct the jury that, if they are satisfied by a preponderance of the evidence of the fact of injury by defendant's train, defendant is prima facie negligent,[49] and that the burden is on defendant to show facts exculpating it from liability,[50] qualifying such instruction, whenever the terms of the statute make it necessary to do so, by enumerating the places at some one of which the injury must have occurred in order to make the presumption operative.[51] Under such a statute, an instruction that, if defendant's train injured plaintiff's cattle, a verdict for plaintiff should be given has been held not erroneous where defendant offered no proof in rebuttal of the presumption.[52] Moreover, where a statutory presumption of negligence on the part of defendant is operative, an instruction is erroneous which places the burden of proving negligence on plaintiff,[53] and a request for an instruction to that effect is properly refused.[54]

On the other hand, where all the facts and circumstances surrounding the injury are in evidence, it has been held proper to instruct, after stating the law as to the burden of proof, that the jury will determine the case from the evidence and not on the statutory presumption of negligence,[55] and that the burden then rests on plaintiff to establish defendant's negligence by a preponderance of proof,[56] although, as discussed supra § 641, it has been held in some jurisdictions that the burden still rests on defendant to overcome inferences of negligence arising from the fact of killing which the statute warrants. Where the evidence raises a question for the jury as to whether the presumption of negligence has been rebutted, an instruction that if the animal was killed without negligence on the part of defendant, plaintiff may not recover, has been held proper.[57]

It has been held that the court should not instruct on the statutory presumption of negligence where the evidence with respect to negligence on the part of defendant is conflicting,[58] or where the evidence sufficiently explains every material fact connected with the infliction of the injury,[59] and that an instruction which invokes the statutory presumption is erroneous where defendant has introduced evidence rebutting the presumption,[60] or where plaintiff's evidence discloses the facts and circumstances of the injury in detail,[61] inasmuch as the statutory presumption may not be appealed to as a deciding witness for plaintiff[62]

Where the evidence discloses a possible killing by any one of several trains but plaintiff does not submit proof as to which train caused the death, it has been held that the court should, in its instruction, apply the law to the evidence relating to each train,[63] and that an instruction permitting a recovery for the killing of the stock by trains as to which the statutory presumption of negligence has been overcome is erroneous,[64] and that a refusal of a request for an instruction to find for defendant if the stock was killed by the train which is shown to have been operated with due care is also erroneous.[65] In the absence of a request to do so, a failure of the court to specify the manner and means of overcoming the presumption has been held not error[66]

§ 682. —— Fences and Cattle Guards

a. In general
b. Sufficiency, defects, and repairs

a. In General

In actions based on a failure of a railroad company to construct or maintain fences or cattle guards, the instructions must conform to the issues and evidence, and be based on all the evidence. They must not be misleading or confusing, or conflicting, and they must not invade the province of the jury.

In actions based on a failure of a railroad company to construct or maintain fences or cattle guards, the instructions must conform to the issues and evidence,[67] and be based on all the evidence [68] They must not be confusing or misleading,[69] or conflicting,[70] and they must not invade the province of the jury.[71]

An instruction has been held erroneous where it lays down a rule of liability different from that prescribed by a fencing statute,[72] or where, in stating what must be found to authorize a recovery, it omits any essential element necessary to establish plaintiff's cause of action under the statute,[73] such as the duty of defendant to fence at the place in question,[74] the necessity that the animal shall have come upon the track at a place where the company should have fenced and had neglected to do so[75] or at the place where the company had permitted its fence to become defective,[76] that the animal must have been running at large where the statute so provides,[77] that the injury was caused by collision with the train, where the statute so provides,[78] and that the failure to fence must have been the cause of the injury.[79]

Where it is alleged that the road was not properly fenced and there is evidence tending to support the allegations, it has been held proper to charge that to entitle plaintiff to recover it is not necessary to find negligence in the operation of the train.[80] Where the undisputed evidence shows that the cattle guard where the animal was injured was located at the place required by law, an instruction allowing the jury to take into consideration the location of the cattle guard in determining whether or not defendant is liable has been held erroneous.[81]

Where there is no statute requiring railroad companies to fence, it has been held that the court should, if requested, instruct the jury that it is not the duty of the railroad to do so.[82]

b. Sufficiency, Defects, and Repairs

An instruction which imposes on a railroad company the duty of maintaining fences and cattle guards sufficient to exclude stock from the track without qualifying the term "sufficient" to mean reasonably sufficient or sufficient under ordinary circumstances has been held erroneous.

An instruction which imposes on a railroad company the duty of maintaining fences and cattle guards sufficient to exclude stock from the track without qualifying the term "sufficient" to mean reasonably sufficient or sufficient to turn ordinary stock under ordinary circumstances has been held erroneous;[83] but an instruction which does not violate the rule that cattle guards should be reasonably sufficient to restrain ordinary stock has been held not erroneous.[84] It has been held not error to charge in the words of the statute that sufficient fences or cattle guards are required, if the qualifying terms are added in another instruction,[85] or that "lawful fences" are required, if the term is defined,[86] although an instruction may be erroneous where it states that a lawful fence is required but fails to define a "lawful fence,"[87] unless the evidence is such as not to require the definition.[88]

An instruction may be erroneous where it makes the duty of keeping a fence in repair absolute instead of merely requiring the exercise of ordinary care in this respect,[89] or where it excludes the question whether the alleged defect was due to a want of repair,[90] or the question whether the company had either actual or constructive notice of the defect[91] or a reasonable time thereafter in which to make the necessary repairs,[92] or the question whether the animal came upon the track and was injured by reason of such defects.[93]

An instruction that defendant would not be liable unless it caused or knew of the defect has been held erroneous in that it would relieve the company of the duty of exercising ordinary care to discover defects.[94] Where there is evidence that some of the animals injured passed over a portion of a cattle guard which was not defective, it has been held error to refuse to charge that under such circumstances defendant would not be liable for such animals.[95] A charge that cattle guards are intended to secure the safety of passengers as well as animals has been held not erroneous as misleading.[96]

In actions brought under statutes requiring the construction and maintenance of gates at farm crossings, the instructions must conform to, and be limited by, the issues presented by the pleadings and evidence, and cover each element of the liability involved, and must not be contradictory or present an abstract proposition of law to the jury.

In actions brought under statutes requiring the construction and maintenance of gates at farm crossings, the instructions must conform to, and be limited by, the issues presented by the pleadings and evidence,[97] and cover each element of the liability involved,[98] and must not be contradictory[99] or present an abstract proposition of law to the jury.[1] Where the statute requires the construction of gates at "necessary" farm crossings, the court should instruct the jury as to the circumstances constituting such necessity[2] unless the necessity for the crossing is not put in issue by defendant.[3]

§ 684. —— Signals, Lookouts, and Precautions

c. Precautions

a. In General

An instruction on the duty of the servants of the defendant railroad company to keep a lookout is proper if there is evidence of their failure to do so, but the instruction must be in terms which will not mislead the jury.

An instruction on the duty of the servants of defendant railroad company to keep a lookout is proper if there is evidence of their failure to do so,[4] but the instruction must be in terms which will not mislead the jury.[5] An instruction is erroneous which would authorize a verdict for defendant on a finding that proper care was exercised at the time of the injury without reference to any preceding negligence having a causal connection therewith,[6] as where the instruction ignores the duty of properly equipping the train,[7] or maintaining a lookout for stock,[8] or limiting such duty to the engineer alone,[9] or to the fireman alone,[10] or to crossings, streets, and highways without regard to the engineer's duty to keep a lookout at any place where he might reasonably anticipate that stock would be on the track,[11] or to the time of the accident without reference to whether the animal might have been discovered sooner,[12] or to animals seen actually upon the track without reference to those in dangerous proximity thereto[13]

It has been held that an instruction is erroneous which would relieve defendant if a lookout was being maintained and the accident could not have been avoided after the animal was seen without reference to whether the train was being operated at a negligent rate of speed or without a proper headlight,[14] or which bases plaintiff's right to recover on the mere fact that defendant failed to keep a lookout without regard to whether such failure was negligent under the particular circumstances,[15] or on the mere fact that defendant was negligent as to keeping a lookout, without requiring that such negligence must have been the cause of the injury,[16] or which, in cases where the animal was a trespasser or the owner guilty of contributory negligence, imposes on the company the same duty as to discovering the animal as in other cases instead of limiting its liability to the question of whether due care was exercised to avoid the injury after the danger was discovered.[17]

b. Crossing Signals

An instruction as to the liability of the defendant railroad company for failure to give statutory crossing signals should not omit the requirement that the injury must have occurred at a public crossing and as a result of the omission of the signals.

An instruction as to the liability of defendant railroad company for failure to give statutory crossing signals should not omit the requirement that the injury must have occurred at a public crossing[18] and as a result of the omission of the signals[19] Such an instruction should state defendant's duty as to blowing the whistle and ringing the bell in the alternative and not the conjunctive when the statute follows the alternative form[20] It must conform to the issues made by the pleadings and evidence,[21] and must not invade the province of the jury.[22]

c. Precautions

An instruction that a railroad company is obliged to use all ordinary and reasonable care to prevent injury has been held not misleading as making prevention of the injury the test of negligence.

An instruction that a railroad company is obliged to use all ordinary and reasonable care to prevent injury has been held not misleading as making prevention of the injury the test of negligence,[23] nor is an instruction as to the efforts to be exercised to prevent injuries to animals misleading in fixing the standard of care as the using of all diligence in the engineer's power, where it is explained in other instructions to mean "ordinary and reasonable care and diligence."[24] However, an instruction invades the province of the jury where it states that it is the engineer's duty, after seeing the animal on the track, to stop his train if possible to do so with safety to his train,[25] unless the statute in terms requires particular acts by the engineer and the instruction merely follows the words of the statute.[26]

An instruction on the care required is erroneous which relieves defendant of liability if its servants acted in good faith without regard to whether their conduct was in fact negligent,[27] or which, in grouping the failures or omissions to act, any one of which would tend to establish defendant's negligence, omits any failure to act brought out in the evidence,[28] unless modified in general terms to direct the attention of the jury to failures or omissions other than the one specifically referred to[29]

An instruction may be erroneous where it limits defendant's duty to the careful operation of the train with the appliances as they actually were without regard to whether defective appliances might not be in themselves evidence of defendant's negligence,[30] or where it ignores the duty to exercise due care as to animals in dangerous proximity to, as well as upon, the track,[31] or where it, on the other hand, tends to make the liability of defendant for failing to stop the train absolute, if it were possible to do so, without reference to whether ordinary care under the circumstances demanded such a precaution,[32] or where the evidence does not show that the animal was injured by a train,[33] or where it informs the jury that defendant would be liable if the train could not have been stopped in time to avoid the injury by reason of the speed at which it was operated, since it ignores the question whether the rate of speed was unreasonable or dangerous or was the proximate cause of the injury.[34]

An instruction has been held erroneous where it states that a dog is an animal of superior intelligence and that an engineer would be justified in believing that the dog would leave the track before being struck,[35] or that the engineer was not required to use the same degree of care on observing a dog on or near the track as he would be on observing a horse, cow, or hog.[36] However, an instruction has been held not erroneous as being incomplete where it states that when an engineer sees a dog on or near the track ahead he is entitled to act or refrain from acting on the presumption that the dog will get out of the way to avoid danger, provided there is nothing in the circumstances to indicate to a reasonably prudent man that the dog is helpless to extricate himself from danger,[37] even though the instruction does not include the alternative "that it is indifferent to its surroundings."[38]

Where there is evidence tending to show certain facts which indicate that the ordinary precautions were or were not taken, the court may instruct the jury hypothetically in case they should so find from the evidence,[39] and where there is evidence suggestive of such a theory the court may instruct the jury that if the whistle was blown for the purpose of wrongfully frightening an animal, and not to keep it from the track, this fact may be considered.[40] Where the precautionary measures to prevent injuries to animals are prescribed by statute, it has been held that an instruction is erroneous which adds to them and imposes a higher degree of care,[41] or which ignores the principle that, although some required precaution was omitted, the company would not be liable if under the circumstances the injury was unavoidable and could not, even by the exercise of such precaution, have been prevented,[42] or which states that a failure to sound the alarm signal is not negligence if due to the engineer being otherwise engaged in the operation of the train without regard to the reasonableness of the engineer's conduct,[43] or which states that the engineer was not negligent in failing to see, if in the darkness it was impossible to see, the animal on the track by reason of the light from the headlight going in a straight line, "or other reason," the latter words referring to the darkness and a curve the existence of which was established by the evidence.[44]

Ordinarily, where there is evidence of a want of ordinary care on the part of the plaintiff, it is proper to instruct the jury that there may be no recovery if the injury complained of was the result of the plaintiff's negligence or the negligence of both the plaintiff and the defendant and without any intentional wrong on the part of the defendant.

on the part of defendant,[45] unless the action is brought under the fencing statutes in jurisdictions where contributory negligence is not a defense to such an action.[46] While it may be error for the court not to submit the issue of contributory negligence to the jury where the question is put in issue by the pleadings and there is evidence tending to show negligence on the part of plaintiff,[47] the rule is otherwise where there is no evidence of any negligence on the part of plaintiff.[48]

The instructions as to contributory negligence must conform to the issues presented by the pleadings and evidence,[49] must not be misleading[50] or assume the existence of facts not in evidence,[51] and must be based on all the evidence and not single out a particular fact and instruct the jury, without reference to the other circumstances in evidence, that it constitutes such negligence on the part of plaintiff as to preclude recovery.[52]

It has been held that an instruction is erroneous which would authorize a recovery by plaintiff notwithstanding the jury might find the issue of contributory negligence to be established by the evidence,[53] which makes the question of contributory negligence dependent on any degree of comparison with the negligence of defendant[54] except where the doctrine of comparative negligence is recognized,[55] or which omits the essential element that plaintiff's negligence, in order to preclude a recovery, must have contributed to the injury complained of,[56] or which informs the jury, without reference to plaintiff's negligence in the particular case, that he may not recover if he was habitually negligent in a certain respect,[57] or which would authorize a recovery on a finding that plaintiff was not negligent regardless of the question of defendant's negligence.[58]

On the other hand, an instruction has been held not erroneous which holds the railroad liable for stock killed or injured from its own negligence provided plaintiff's negligence does not "materially" contribute to such injury,[59] especially where such instruction is considered with other instructions correctly stating the law and omitting the word "materially."[60]

§ 686. Verdict, Findings, and Judgment

a. In general
b. Enforcement of judgment

a. In General

General rules apply with respect to the verdict, findings, and judgment in actions against railroad companies for injuries to animals.

General rules apply with respect to the verdict,[61] findings,[62] and judgment[63] in actions against railroad companies for injuries to animals. Thus a verdict is not invalid for informality if its meaning is sufficiently clear to be the basis of a legal judgment.[64] Where a complaint is in several counts and plaintiff has a verdict on one and is not entitled to recover on the others, judgment may properly be entered for plaintiff on the one count and for defendant on the others.[65] In an action brought under a statute allowing double damages, where plaintiff alleges that he has been damaged in a certain amount for which he asks judgment and for all other and proper relief according to the statute, the court may render judgment for double the actual damages assessed by the jury, although there is no formal prayer in the complaint for double damages.[66] Under some statutory provisions judgment may not be entered before the expiration of a given time after the filing with defendant's station agent of an affidavit of ownership and injury to live stock,[67] but the filing of such affidavit is for the benefit of defendant and may be waived by it.[68]

Special verdicts and findings. In order to sustain a judgment for plaintiff, a special verdict should find facts which support the theory of the complaint;[69] it should contain every fact essential to entitle plaintiff to recover,[70] and if it is silent on any material point it may be held, as to that point, to be against the party on whom is the burden of proof.[71] So a special verdict will not sustain a judgment for plaintiff where it merely finds that the crossing signals were not given and does not also find that the omission was the cause of the injury,[72] or, in case the track was fenced so that there was no duty to keep a lookout for stock, where it fails to find that the animal injured was seen by those in charge of the train,[73] or where it finds merely that the railroad fence was out of repair without any finding that defendant was negligent in failing to repair it within a reasonable time,[74] or, if the complaint alleges that the animal was injured at a crossing by reason of a failure to give crossing signals, where it does not state where the injury occurred.[75] Where the burden is on plaintiff to show freedom from contributory negligence, a special verdict which does not find that plaintiff was free from contributory negligence has been held not to support a judgment in his favor.[76]

In the case of a general verdict with special findings of fact, it is only where the findings are so inconsistent with the general verdict or with each other that the two cannot stand that the general verdict will be set aside[77] and, if they can by any hypothesis be reconciled with the general verdict, the latter will control and the court should render judgment thereon,[78] but the verdict should be set aside where the special findings show that the case was decided solely on an erroneous theory induced by misleading instructions and not supported by the evidence,[79] or where the special findings show a palpable bias in the minds of the jury against the unsuccessful party,[80] or that the jury disregarded the instructions of the court.[81]

In an action for the entire damage for injury to several of plaintiff's animals by separate trains of defendant, there need be no special findings as to the number and value of animals injured by each train unless the jury find that there was negligence in the operation of one but not in the other.[82] Where the complaint contains allegations which, if proved, would authorize a verdict for double damages on the ground of a failure to fence or actual damages for negligence in the operation of the train, a special finding of negligence in the latter respect will sustain a verdict for full damages apart from the question of sufficient fences.[83]

b. Enforcement of Judgment

Special statutory provisions may control with respect to the enforcement of a judgment obtained in an action against a railroad company for injuries to animals by its locomotives, cars, or other carriages.

Under a special statutory provision that if an action against a railroad company for injuries to animals by its locomotives, cars, or other carriages is brought in the circuit court of the county where the injury occurred the court may, on motion and notice to the company, order any agent to appear and answer as to the amount of money in his hands belonging to the company, and order him to make payment therefrom in satisfaction of the judgment and costs, it has been held that, where the action is brought before a justice, plaintiff, on filing a certified transcript of the judgment rendered with the clerk of the circuit court, shall on motion and notice be entitled under this statute to the same order and proceedings [84] Under such a statute the proceeding has been held to be in the nature of an original action,[85] wherein an answer may be filed and issues formed as in civil actions,[86] so that the motion is in effect a complaint, the sufficiency of which may be tested by a demurrer,[87] and must therefore allege every material fact necessary to entitle plaintiff to the benefit of the statutory proceeding [88]

The motion or complaint, under such a statute, must show that the judgment was entered of record[89] and that the certified transcript was properly filed with the clerk,[90] although a motion requesting an order to the agent to pay the judgment has been held to be a sufficient notice to the railroad of the purpose of the motion,[91] especially in the absence of an objection to its sufficiency [92] The motion must also allege facts showing the jurisdiction of the justice,[93] or else, as is permissible under the statute, allege that the judgment or decision of the justice "was duly given or made "[94]

Where the case is instituted in the circuit court of the county of the injury and the venue is changed, the proceedings may be brought in the court where the judgment was rendered [95] The notice to the company need not be served on the particular agent whom plaintiff moves to be required to appear and answer, but may be served in the manner provided by statute for the service of a summons on a railroad company,[96] and where the action is in the circuit court and the motion is made at the time the judgment is rendered, the parties all being present, no notice to the company has been held necessary.[97]

a. In General

A statute imposing liability for attorney's fees on railroad companies in actions to recover for stock killed or injured where the plaintiff succeeds, and not imposing a correlative liability on the plaintiff if he fails, is unconstitutional if it is designed merely to compel payment for indebtedness; but statutes authorizing attorney's fees have been held constitutional where enacted to enforce a special duty to fence on railroad companies by reason of the business in which they are engaged.

fees may be had if the action is based on that ground,[2] but not where the action is based on common-law negligence,[3] although a plaintiff who bases his action entirely on defendant's failure to fence may not be deprived of his right to the fee merely because there is in the case some evidence of defendant's negligence in operation of the train.[4] In the absence of evidence of noncompliance by defendant with a fencing statute,[5] or where the evidence shows that the road is fenced,[6] it has been held that attorney's fees may not be recovered. It has also been held that such fees may not be included in a general verdict based on a declaration containing several counts, only a part of which charge a failure to fence,[7] and that where an action is brought to recover for the killing of several animals, only a part of which were killed because of a failure to fence, a verdict including attorney's fees, applying to all the animals killed, may not be sustained.[8]

b. Where Liability Based on Failure to Pay after Demand

Statutes allowing attorney's fees to be recovered from a railroad company refusing to pay for killing stock within a specified time after demand have been held constitutional.

While statutes allowing attorney's fees to be recovered from a railroad company refusing to pay for killing stock within a specified time after demand have been held constitutional,[9] such statutes may not be constitutionally applied where plaintiff's claim is in excess of the actual value of the injured animal as later determined by the jury[10] unless it appears that the necessity for the action was produced by the denial of liability by the railroad company and was not occasioned by an honest difference in the valuation of the animal.[11]

Where a fencing statute further provides that defendant's liability for attorney's fees and costs shall depend on plaintiff having made a demand or claim on the railroad company and the failure on the part of the company to pay within a certain time after presentation, plaintiff may be entitled to attorney's fees on proof of demand and defendant's failure to pay.[12] Also, where recovery of attorney's fees is provided for in the stock laws, in actions to recover for animals injured by the operation of a railroad brought after demand made on the railroad company, plaintiff whose demand was in excess of the amount recovered does not thereby forfeit his right to attorney's fees,[13] especially where defendant's refusal to comply with the demand was based on the ground of nonliability and not on the ground that the demand was excessive.[14]

c. Recovery and Proceedings Therefor

Attorney's fees may, in a proper case, be recovered in the action for damages without bringing a separate action therefor.

Attorney's fees may, in a proper case, be recovered in the action for damages without bringing a separate action therefor,[15] and it has been held unnecessary that the verdict find the amount of damages and attorney's fees separately.[16] However, an excess of claim over the amount awarded in the verdict bars recovery of attorney's fees where the statute expressly so provides,[17] even though the verdict in form exceeds the claim, where it is shown to include attorney's fees and the amount of the award for damages is really less than the amount claimed.[18]

Amount recoverable. There must be evidence of the reasonableness of the fee awarded,[19] and the amount should be determined by the jury instead of by the court unless a jury is waived.[20] Where the statute allowing attorney's fees is by its terms applicable only to claims under a stated amount, such a fee has been held not recoverable on a claim over the amount specified by statute,[21] even though it represents the consolidated claims for several injured cattle, each one of which was for less than the statutory limit.[22] Where the case is tried a second time on appeal, plaintiff may be entitled to recover for the services of his attorney at both trials,[23] provided at the subsequent trial he succeeds in securing a judgment for damages against defendant.[24]

Double costs. Under some statutes plaintiff may recover double costs unless prior to the institution of an action defendant makes a tender of the damages sustained, provided the action is not instituted before the expiration of the statutory period allowed the railroad company for making its investigation and tender.[25]

b. Disposition of carcass
c. Exemplary damages
d. Double damages
e. Interest

a. In General

Ordinarily, in the absence of statute providing otherwise or of any circumstances of aggravation or mitigation, the measure of damages in an action to recover compensation from a railroad company for animals killed or lost to the owner is the actual market value of the animals at the time of the killing or loss.

Ordinarily, in the absence of statute providing otherwise or of any circumstances of aggravation or mitigation, the measure of damages in an action to recover compensation from a railroad company for animals killed or lost to the owner is the actual market value of the animals at the time of the killing or loss.[26] The owner may also be entitled to the value of the animal where it is so badly injured as to necessitate its being killed,[27] or where the wounded animals are taken over and disposed of and the proceeds appropriated by the railroad company,[28] but not where the animal is merely wounded and is abandoned by its owner without notice to the railroad company.[29]

Where the evidence of value is in conflict, a verdict for an amount between the highest and lowest sums named may be sustained[30] even though no witness has testified to the exact amount found.[31] Where no market quotations can be had, the damages may be fixed at the intrinsic worth of the animal to be determined by its character, qualities, uses to which it is put, value of its services, and prices offered for it.[32]

Wounded animals. With respect to wounded animals, it has been held that the measure of damages is the difference in the market value of the animal immediately before and after the injury.[33] While it has been held that the owner is not entitled to recover for the expense of curing the animal,[34] or for the care and attention of injured stock which afterward dies,[35] or for the value of time lost in replacing the lost or injured animal,[36] it has also been held that, in addition to the difference in the market value of the animal immediately before and after the injury, the owner may recover for the expense of curing the animal,[37] or, if it dies, compensation for its care during its illness,[38] provided his efforts were in good faith and there was reasonable ground to believe that the animal could be cured or restored to usefulness.[39]

In some jurisdictions the rule of market value immediately before and after the injury has been disapproved,[40] and it has been held that plaintiff should recover the diminution in market value after the animal was cured or restored to usefulness as far as a cure was effected,[41] and in addition thereto the amount reasonably expended in caring for the animal and attempting to cure the injury,[42] as well as the value of the use of the animal during such period as the owner was deprived thereof,[43] provided the whole damages do not exceed the original value of the animal.[44] It has further been held that, although the owner's efforts are unsuccessful and the animal dies, he may still recover, in addition to the value of the animal, the amount expended in caring therefor,[45] and compensation for the loss of its services during its illness.[46]

Circumstances affecting value In determining the value of an animal, the jury may consider all of its qualities and all the circumstances that would affect its actual or market value,[47] without limiting the inquiry to its value for special purposes.[48] On the other hand, it has been held that the inquiry should not include matters peculiar to plaintiff growing out of the character of his business,[49] as, for example, injuries to plaintiff's dairy business from the loss of an injured cow.[50]

b. Disposition of Carcass

Under a statute declaring that a railroad wrongfully killing an animal shall be liable to the owner for its value, an owner has been held to have the right to abandon the animal and recover its full value from the company without deduction of the value of the carcass

Under a statute declaring that a railroad wrongfully killing an animal shall be liable to the owner for its value, an owner has been held to have a right to abandon the animal and recover its full value from the company without deduction of the value of the carcass.[51] Where damages for the killing of stock by a railroad are determined by a statute declaring in substance that the company is liable "for all damages," as distinguished from "the value of the stock if killed," the measure of damages for animals killed is not necessarily the value of the animal when alive, but the difference in value between the living animal and the carcass;[52] and although plaintiff may abandon the carcass where, from its location or condition when found, it would be impracticable to dispose of it, and recover the full value,[53] yet, if he converts it to his own use or otherwise disposes of it,[54] or if he might realize appreciable value for it by the exercise of reasonable diligence,[55] the net amount of such value should be deducted; but only the net value should be deducted, and plaintiff is entitled to reasonable compensation for his time and expenses.[56] Plaintiff must also be allowed a reasonable time to dispose of the carcass.[57]

c. Exemplary Damages

While it has been held that exemplary damages may be awarded where the injury is due to gross negligence or wanton or willful misconduct on the part of the employees of the railroad company, irrespective of the company's authorization or ratification, it has also been held that such damages may not be allowed in the absence of evidence that the company authorized or approved the act complained of.

While it has been held that exemplary damages may be awarded where the injury is due to gross negligence or wanton or willful misconduct on the part of the employees of the railroad company, irrespective of the company's authorization or ratification,[58] it has also been held that such damages may not be allowed in the absence of evidence that the railroad company authorized or approved the act complained of[59] If wantonness or willfulness is not shown, but only ordinary negligence[60] or a failure of the railroad to fence its tracks[61] is indicated, compensatory damages only may be allowed

Where valid statutes so provide, the plaintiff may recover double damages for injuries to animals occasioned by a failure of a railroad company to fence its tracks, or where the claim is not paid within a certain time after presentation, or where the company fails to post notices of the injury as required by law

Where valid statutes so provide, plaintiff may recover double damages for injuries to animals occasioned by a failure of the railroad company to fence its tracks,[62] or where the claim is not paid within a certain time after presentation,[63] or where the company fails to post notices of the injury as required by law.[64] While there is some authority holding that statutes allowing double damages for failure of the railroad company to give notice to the owner,[65] and for failure to pay a claim within a certain time of the presentation,[66] are unconstitutional, the constitutionality of statutes allowing double damages for injuries to animals where the company has breached a statutory duty, such as a duty to fence,[67] or where the owner's claim against the railroad company is not paid within a certain time after presentation,[68] have been upheld, although it has also been held that such a statute may not be constitutionally applied where plaintiff's claim is in excess of the actual value of the injured animal as later determined by the jury[69]

A statute authorizing the recovery of double damages, under certain circumstances, for injuries to animals by a railroad should be strictly construed,[70] and in order to procure its benefits plaintiff must comply strictly with its terms[71] Such statutes are highly penal in character,[72] and where a statute allows double damages for failure to fence it is so far penal that it may not be construed as applicable to cases not clearly within its scope and intent,[73] as, for example, to injuries due to causes other than defendant's failure to fence,[74] or to causes other than an actual collision with a train,[75] or to causes not proved by sufficient evidence to be within its scope or intent.[76] Also such a statute may be inapplicable where the animal is killed at a point where the railroad company is not required to fence,[77] or where the owner does not recover the entire amount sued for.[78] However, the inapplicability of double damage provisions will not affect plaintiff's right to recover compensatory damages where such right exists.[79]

Under a statute allowing double damages where the claim is not paid within a certain time after presentation, the liability of defendant for double damages will not be affected by failure of the claim to state the county in which the accident happened,[80] or by a tender of damages by defendant unless the full value as subsequently found by the jury is tendered.[81] Likewise, under a statute authorizing the recovery of double damages, if notice of the injury is not posted by the company, defendant's liability for failure to post is not affected by the fact that the owner had actual knowledge of the injury,[82] although double damages may not be recovered, under such a statute, if defendant proves a posting of notice at the nearest station house.[83] The burden is on plaintiff to prove defendant's failure to post,[84] but he establishes a prima facie case of such failure by showing that, on several examinations of defendant's station, no notice was found either at the usual place of posting or in front of the building,[85] although it is not enough to show a single examination made a considerable time before the expiration of the time allowed for posting.[86]

Where double damages are recoverable under the statute, either the court or the jury may double the actual damages found to have been sustained,[87] and the owner may recover not only double the depreciation in value of his animal because of the injury, but also double damages for the care, attention, medicine, and other expenses directly resulting therefrom where damages for such expenses are recoverable,[88] but it has been held that he is not entitled to recover double damages for loss of, or injury to, a buggy,[89] or for loss of a harness, even though lost or injured by the act of killing the animal wearing it at the time.[90] It has further been held that plaintiff may not recover more than the amount of damages as stated in his notice of the injury.[91]

e. Interest

In some jurisdictions interest may be recovered on the amount of damages from the date of injury; in others, from the commencement of the action, although this right has been held restricted to cases of willful injury. It has also been held that no interest prior to the rendition of judgment may be allowed

In some jurisdictions interest may be recovered on the amount of damages from the date of the injury,[92] in others, from the commencement of the action,[93] although this right has been held restricted to cases of willful injury.[94] It has also been held that no interest prior to the rendition of judgment may be allowed.[95] Under some statutory provisions, interest at the special rate designated by the statute and computed from the date of the demand may be recovered,[96] and by virtue of some statutory provisions the allowance of interest is discretionary with the jury.[97]

XVI. ACCIDENTS TO TRAINS

§ 690. Management of Trains in General

It is the duty of a railroad company to exercise proper care in the management of its trains to prevent collisions or accidents which might result in injury, the degree of care required varying according to the relations between the parties

The duty of a railroad company to exercise proper care in the management of its trains to prevent collisions or accidents to trains which might result in injury, and its liability for such injuries, exist at common law independently of, and concurrently with, its duties under statutes[98] or rules.[99]

The duty of a railroad to prevent collisions or accidents to trains which might result in injury to its passengers, and its liability for such injuries, are treated in Carriers §§ 746–748; and the corresponding duty and liability of a railroad as to its employees are discussed in Master and Servant §§ 171–554. Such duty and liability, with respect to the passengers, employees, and trains of another company using the same tracks, are considered infra § 692, and with respect to the passengers, employees, and trains of another company using intersecting tracks, infra § 693

The standard and degree of care required of a railroad in the management of its trains so as to prevent collisions or accidents vary according to the relations between the parties,[1] and are proportioned to the capacity of the railroad for inflicting injury[2] and to the danger existing under the particular situation.[3] As to persons on trains of other companies to whom defendant owes a duty of care, such as passengers[4] or employees[5] of another railroad, the rule requiring the exercise of ordinary care generally applies; and the rule applies also as to employees of other companies running their own cars on defendant's tracks by arrangement with defendant[6] So also the rule applies as to the property of another railroad[7] To trespassers on its own trains a railroad company owes no duty beyond that of not willfully injuring them,[8] but to invitees on its own trains it owes a duty of ordinary care,[9] as it does also to a stranger riding in the engine of the other railroad with permission of the engineer, but contrary to the rules of the other railroad.[10] In the extraordinary case of a train of one company being wrongfully upon the track of another, the latter owes the former no higher degree of care than to any other trespasser under the same circumstances,[11] while the former's act of trespass amounting to wanton or reckless conduct under the circumstances subjects it to the assessment of punitive damages for injuries resulting therefrom[12]

Duty to warn of obvious danger. A railroad has no duty to warn persons of a danger in connection with its management of trains where such danger is apparent and obvious and a warning would serve no useful purpose[13]

Except where prescribed by statute, no particular rate of speed in running a train is negligence per se

In the absence of any statute or ordinance on the subject, no particular rate of speed in running a train is negligence per se,[14] although the rate of speed may be considered in connection with other circumstances in determining the issue of negligence[15] When the rate of speed is expressly limited by statute or ordinance, as discussed supra § 431, the operation of trains at a speed exceeding the rate prescribed is negligence per se,[16] and renders the company liable for injuries due to such excessive rate of speed,[17] independently of notice or actual knowledge of such statute or ordinance on the part of the railroad.[18] Such regulations are not intended merely for the protection of the general public in crossing railroad tracks, but apply to cases of collision between trains resulting in personal injuries to employees thereon[19] or damage to the train.[20]

§ 692. Collision on Same Track

A railroad must exercise due care to avoid collisions between its own trains on the same track, and, where two railroads use the same track, each must exercise due care to avoid injury to the trains and property of the other or to persons rightfully thereon.

A railroad company is conclusively presumed to know the whereabouts of all of its own trains,[21] and must exercise due care to avoid collisions between its trains on the same track.[22] Thus its servants must exercise due care in the observance of schedule time and all rules and orders designed for this purpose,[23] and in the choice of a course of conduct in case of emergency.[24] So an employee upon one train may in the absence of contributory negligence recover for injuries caused by a collision due to the negligence of those in charge of another of defendant's trains,[25] or due to the negligence of its train dispatcher in sending out trains upon the same section of track without proper orders to prevent collisions,[26] and a person riding upon an engine by invitation of the engineer who had authority to issue such invitation may recover for injuries resulting from a collision due to the negligence of the engineer of the other train.[27] However, statutes controlling the management of trains at junctions or crossings of tracks belonging to two different companies do not apply to junctions or unions of tracks belonging to the same railroad,[28] and hence a failure to stop before reaching a junction, which would have imposed liability on the company if the junction had been with another company's tracks, will not have that effect, independently of common-law negligence, where the junction is between tracks of a single company.[29]

Trains of different companies. Where two railroad companies by agreement or otherwise are rightfully entitled to the use of the same track, each company is under the duty of exercising due care to avoid injury to the trains and property of the other or to persons rightfully on such trains.[30] So, in case of collision or accident to trains where there is a joint use of the same track, the employees of one company may, in the absence of contributory negligence, recover against the other company for injuries due to negligence on the part of that company's servants in the operation of its trains,[31] or in violating rules and orders,[32] as in failing to send out flagmen or otherwise to warn other trains where a train is delayed,[33] or stopped at an unusual place,[34] or run backward,[35] or due to negligence on the part of its switchmen in the operation of switches controlling the use of such tracks,[36] or to negligence on the part of the company in failing to issue proper orders to its trainmen for the prevention of collisions with other trains,[37] or in failing to notify others entitled to use its track of a change in schedules or orders.[38] The company guilty of such negligence will also be liable for injury to the trains of the other railroad company[39] or to passengers thereon;[40] and it will be liable to the other company for liabilities incurred by it to third persons growing out of the collision.[41]

injured by the collision may sue either, and the company sued cannot urge as a defense that the negligence of the other company exceeded its own,[42] or the action may be maintained against both notwithstanding there was no breach of any joint duty.[43]

§ 693. Collision Where Roads Cross

a. In general
b. Right of way
c. Duty to stop before crossing
d. Lights, signals, and other warnings

a. In General

Those in control of trains approaching or passing an intersection with another railroad or street railroad must exercise due care commensurate with the danger of the situation, and must comply with statutes relating thereto. Where both companies are negligent a person injured, including a passenger of one of the lines, can recover against either or both.

It is the duty of those in control of trains moving upon intersecting lines of railway when approaching or passing the place of intersection to exercise due care commensurate with the danger of the situation to prevent collisions.[44] Due care must also be used to avoid collisions with streetcars at the intersection of a street railroad,[45] especially where the conditions are such as to obstruct a view of the crossing.[46] However, those in control of trains have the right to assume that the operator of a streetcar will exercise due care.[47]

In the performance of this duty, those in charge of the train must keep a proper lookout for trains upon the intersecting track,[48] especially if the train is being backed across the intersection,[49] and must have their train under proper control so that if the necessity arises it can be promptly stopped,[50] and, as appears infra subdivision c of this section, the train must, before reaching the crossing, be brought to a full stop if a statute so requires. The generally accepted rule that violation of a duty imposed by statute or ordinance constitutes negligence per se has been applied with respect to statutes covering the operation of railroad trains where tracks of different railroads cross each other.[51]

Liability of companies. In case of collision between trains of different companies, if only one company was negligent there can be no recovery against the other,[52] but if both were negligent they are both liable,[53] and persons injured thereby may recover against either the full amount of the damages sustained regardless of the negligence of the other.[54] A passenger of one railroad may recover against another railroad whose negligence contributes to cause a collision by which he was injured,[55] even though the company carrying him was also negligent;[56] and a passenger on a streetcar may recover against a railroad whose negligence contributed to produce the injury,[57] even though those in charge of the streetcar were also negligent[58] or were acting in violation of a contract between the companies as to the precautions to be taken by the employees of the streetcar company in the use of the crossing.[59] In an action by a passenger against both companies for injuries due to a negligent collision at a crossing, it is no defense for one of defendants to show merely that the negligence of the other exceeded its own.[60]

and to a duty to govern the movement of its own trains accordingly.[61]

Cars obstructing crossings. A railroad company negligently leaving cars standing so as to obstruct a railroad crossing will, in case of a collision therewith and in the absence of contributory negligence, be liable for injuries to the employees upon the train of the intersecting road,[62] and also for the damage done to the train of that company.[63] If its action in placing cars on the crossing is not a legitimate use of the tracks at that point, the fact that it had no notice of the train which collided with the cars will not affect its liability.[64]

b. Right of Way

It is negligence to attempt to drive a train past a crossing over which another train has the right of way. Subject to various exceptions, the train which first stops at the crossing has precedence; but an engineer cannot rely absolutely on his right of way.

It is negligence to attempt to drive a train past a railroad crossing over which another company has the right of way when a train of that company is approaching,[65] the rule applying also to crossings in railroad yards where switch engines are operating.[66]

Who has right of way generally. While a railroad has the right of way where its tracks intersect those of a street railway,[67] the rule as between two roads, neither of which is a street railway, is, in the absence of a statute or agreement providing otherwise, that each railroad has an equal right to the use of the crossing,[68] and the train which first reaches the stopping place and stops has the right of precedence.[69] The fact that a train on one road is scheduled to pass at a particular time does not affect the equal right of both to the use of the crossing,[70] although it may have a bearing on the question whether or not it was negligent for the other road to exercise its right under particular circumstances,[71] each railroad being held to a knowledge of the other's published train schedules.[72]

Right of way under statute or agreement. The right of way may be made the subject of regulation by statute or agreement, in which case the terms of statute or agreement control, as, for example, that the train on the road first built shall have precedence,[73] that a passenger train shall have the right of way over a freight train,[74] that regular trains on time shall take precedence over trains of the same grade not on time or having no schedule time,[75] or that a train signaled to pass shall have the right of way over a train against which the signal is set.[76]

Limitation on exercise of right. An engineer of a train having the right of way cannot rely absolutely on a recognition and observance of his prior right by the engineer of the other train;[77] and it is negligence on his part to attempt to pass the crossing without keeping a lookout for trains upon the other road,[78] or, if such a train is approaching, not to ascertain whether it is going to stop.[79] However, if the other train has stopped as it was its duty to do, the engineer having the right of way may reasonably assume that it will remain at its place until he shall have passed the crossing;[80] and an engineer in moving his train over a crossing may indulge the presumption that an approaching train on the intersecting track will stop in obedience to the statutory requirements.[81] This presumption, however, will not protect the railroad from liability for want of care in proceeding when it becomes apparent, or reasonably so, that the engineer of the other train is negligent or disobedient,[82] and the engineer entitled to the right of way cannot exercise it under conditions where to do so would result inevitably in a collision, and where, by not exercising the right, it would be reasonably possible to avoid the collision,[83] as where the train not having the right of way is already on the crossing[84] or is indicating its intention to cross[85] A train which otherwise would have the right of way cannot exercise it as against a train signaled to cross, provided it knew, or by the exercise of reasonable care could have known, that the signal had been set against it.[86]

c. Duty to Stop before Crossing

In general, one in charge of a train must stop and ascertain whether a crossing with another railroad can be made in safety, and if stopping is required by statute the failure to comply is negligence per se.

Except where other means are provided to prevent collisions,[87] it is the duty of a person in charge of a train, before crossing another railroad, to stop, look, and listen for other trains and ascertain whether the crossing can be made in safety;[88] and the duty at common law continues even though a statute penalizes the failure to stop.[89] Moreover, if required by statute, the failure of a railroad to bring its trains to a full stop before crossing the tracks of another railroad is negligence per se,[90] whether or not there be any visible necessity for so doing.[91] However, while the statute applies also to crossings in railroad yards where switch engines are operated,[92] unless so required by statute[93] the train need not stop before crossing intersecting tracks of a switchyard belonging to itself[94] Moreover, except where the statute expressly requires it,[95] a statute requiring stops before crossing tracks of another railroad does not require a railroad to stop its trains before crossing tracks of a street railroad[96] Where the rules of the company require its engineers to stop before crossing another railroad, it is their duty to obey such instructions[97] even though signaled by another employee that the crossing is clear[98]

Distance from crossing. Where the statute merely requires trains to be stopped before crossing another railroad, but does not prescribe the distance from the crossing, they should be stopped at such a distance as under the circumstances common prudence would dictate as necessary to avoid a collision.[99] However, where a statute prescribes the distance within which the train must stop, such statute must be complied with,[1] although if the statute prescribes the distance and requires the stop to be made "within" that distance a stop at any point between the named limit and the track satisfies the statutory requirements;[2] but the stop must be made somewhere within the statutory limit, even though by so doing the rear end of the train overlaps the tracks of another railroad at another intersecting point.[3]

Brakes and other equipment. The use of air brakes to bring the train to a stop before crossings, independently of any statutory requirements, may be a part of a railroad's common-law duty at crossings,[4] the question whether it is or not depending on whether its use was reasonably necessary in the exercise of its duty to use ordinary care[5] A sudden unexpected failure of air brakes to work will not excuse the railroad in not stopping its train if there were other appliances which could have been used and were not.[6] If the engineer cannot stop his train because of failure of the brakes to work, he must give warning of his approach to the crossing, and failure to do so is negligence.[7] A statute permitting trains to cross without stopping, provided they maintain an interlocking device on switches at the crossing, cannot be relied on as a defense in an action for injuries resulting from a collision, when it appears that the interlocking device was not in working order.[8]

Duty after stopping. Merely stopping the train is not a sufficient precaution, but those in charge of the train must ascertain whether the way is clear and proceed with due caution, keeping a careful lookout and with the train under proper control;[9] but where they have taken these precautions they may proceed on the assumption that an approaching train on the other track, but not in close proximity to the crossing, will stop before reaching the crossing.[10] After stopping at the intersection with a street railway, the engineer should give warning of his intention to start his train again.[11]

Persons protected by the statute. The statute requiring trains to be stopped before crossing another railroad is not intended solely for the protection of trains using the crossing and of persons, employees, and others rightfully on such trains, but for the protection of all persons rightfully within the region of danger created by noncompliance with its requirements.[12]

What company liable. In the absence of contributory negligence, discussed infra § 700, the failure to stop renders the offending company,[13] or, where both companies fail to stop, either,[14] or both,[15] of the offending companies, liable for any damages directly caused by such omission.

d. Lights, Signals, and Other Warnings

A railroad company is liable for injuries resulting from its engineer's failure to heed the warning of, or to observe, lights or other signal devices at a crossing, and it is also liable for negligence as to its duty to give such signals.

A railroad company will be liable for injuries due to a collision caused by an engineer's disregarding the warning of lights or signal devices at a crossing indicating that the crossing is occupied or that a train on the intersecting track has the right of way,[16] or by his failure to observe such lights or signals and ascertain thereby whether he can cross with safety,[17] or for negligence on the part of its servants charged with the duty of giving the signals to trains at the crossing.[18] No duty rests on the engineer to sound the whistle or ring the bell after discovering a train on the intersecting road in a dangerous position, where it appears that the collision would not have been averted if he had done it and he resorted to every means known to skillful engineers to avert the collision.[19]

Where railroad crosses track of street railway, it is negligence to permit a train to approach the crossing without giving a signal of its approach or other warning of danger,[20] and all statutory requirements as to the ringing of bells and the blowing of whistles at such crossings must be complied with,[21] particularly if it is dark or foggy so that the view of the train is obscured.[22] Moreover, the violation of a statute requiring a train to have its headlight lighted as it approaches such a crossing has been held to be negligence per se.[23]

Statute as to public crossing held not violated

Under statute relating to duty of railroad to sound warning before crossing public road or street, failure of railroad to ring bell, sound whistle, or slacken speed while crossing private crossing of street-car tracks and railroad track was not violation of statute.—Berry v. Kansas City Public Service Co, 108 S.W.2d 98, 341 Mo. 658.

22. Ill.—Wabash R Co. v. Barrett, 11 Ill App. 315.

23. Mo.—Berry v. Kansas City Public Service Co., 108 S.W.2d 98, 341 Mo. 658.

At a crossing in a city which is much used and where streetcars pass frequently it is negligence not to maintain gates or a flagman to prevent collisions therewith,[24] but in the absence of evidence that the crossing is more than ordinarily dangerous no such duty exists.[25] If gates are maintained, the railroad will be liable for injuries resulting from collisions with streetcars due to a failure to keep a servant to operate the gates,[26] or due to the negligence of its gatemen in not keeping a proper lookout for trains and cars and failing to lower the gates,[27] or operating the gates in a negligent or improper manner.[28] However, it is not negligent for a gatekeeper to raise a gate already down for an approaching train in order to permit a person who is caught between the gates to escape.[29]

Where two intersecting roads establish signal system for use at a crossing and each agrees to conform thereto, the company violating such agreement will be liable for any resulting injuries to the trains of the other, even though the agreement contains no provision for indemnity in case of its violation.[30] If a signal tower is maintained under joint agreement of all the railroad companies using the intersection, the negligence of the servant in charge of the tower is properly chargeable against all the companies jointly, so that any one or any number of them may be sued separately or jointly to recover damages for injuries resulting therefrom.[31]

§ 694. Defects in Roadbed or Tracks

A railroad will be liable for injuries occasioned by accidents to trains due to its negligence in the construction, maintenance, or inspection of its roadbed.

A railroad company will be liable for injuries occasioned by the wrecking or derailing of trains due to negligence on the part of the company in the construction of its roadbed,[32] or in failing to keep it in a safe and proper state of repair,[33] or to inspect it with sufficient care and frequency for the purpose of discovering defects therein.[34] At times or places of particular peril, greater promptness and vigilance in inspecting a roadbed is required,[35] as in the case of severe storms, and particularly at places most likely to be affected thereby.[36] In the case of injuries due to the washing away of culverts and embankments by floods and storms the company will be liable if negligent as to their original construction,[37] but it will not be liable if they are so constructed as to withstand any dangers of this character reasonably to be apprehended[38] and they are destroyed by floods or storms of unusual and unprecedented violence and there was no negligence in the operation of the train,[39] unless the company was negligent in failing to inspect the roadbed within a proper time after such floods or storms.[40]

§ 695. Obstructions on Tracks

A railroad company is liable for injuries resulting from negligence in the operation of a train running into an obstruction on the track; and it is liable if it puts or permits obstructions on the track so as to be struck by passing trains without warning.

A railroad company will be liable for personal injuries to persons rightfully upon its trains due to its trains running into obstructions upon the track, where there was negligence in the operation of the train;[41] and the railroad will be liable if guilty of negligence in putting such obstruction on or so near the track as to be struck by passing trains without warning thereof.[42] The railroad must exercise particular caution where the engineer has had warning of the possibility of obstruction at a particular place.[43]

Cars on track. Independently of a violation of rules, a railroad is liable if it permits a train to stand on a track without warning to other trains of the obstruction, under circumstances making such warning necessary for their protection.[44] Accordingly, if it permits cars to stand on its tracks at night without lights to warn, or guards to give notice to, other trains which may be using the tracks, it is liable to anyone on the other train injured thereby.[45]

Duty to discover. A railroad charged with the duty of inspection is liable if, because of its negligent acts or omissions, it fails to discover and remove the obstruction if put there by others[46] However, ordinarily it is not bound to anticipate the placing of obstructions on the track by others, and to guard against their doing it;[47] and if its failure to discover the obstruction is due to no negligent act or omission of its own it will not be held liable.[48]

A railroad company will be liable for injuries to persons rightfully on its train caused by collisions with animals on the track, where the railroad was guilty of negligence in connection therewith.

A railroad company will be liable for injuries to persons rightfully on its train caused by collisions with animals on the track where there was negligence either in the operation of the train,[49] or in allowing bushes to grow upon the right of way so as to conceal the presence of animals thereon,[50] or in failing to construct or maintain fences and cattle guards,[51] or in failing to remove from the track an animal killed or wounded by another of defendant's trains[52] Where the railroad is not required to fence its tracks, its liability for injuries due to collisions with animals must be grounded on other negligent acts or omissions[53] The railroad's liability for injuries to persons rightfully on its trains negligently caused by collisions with animals upon the track is not affected by the fact that the animal is a trespasser on the track[54]

§ 697. —— Persons Liable

One who wrongfully or negligently obstructs a railroad track may be liable for injury done to the railroad's trains and property injured by collision with such obstruction; the owner of animals may be similarly liable where he permits the animals to run at large in violation of law or in a dangerous area.

A person who wrongfully or negligently obstructs a railroad track will, in the absence of contributory negligence on the part of the railroad company, be liable for injury done to its trains and property by collision with such obstruction.[55] However, the owner of private cars placed on a siding by permission of, and at a place designated by, the agent of the company will not be liable merely because of its ownership of the cars for an injury to another employee of the company caused by a train colliding with such cars.[56]

Owner of animal. In jurisdictions where it is lawful for stock to run at large, the mere fact of permitting it to do so is not such negligence as to render the owner liable to a railroad company in case the stock wanders upon an unfenced track and a collision occurs resulting in injury to the train,[57] although even where it is lawful for stock to run at large the owner may permit it to do so under such circumstances as to render him liable to the railroad on the ground of negligence[58] The railroad may recover for injuries to its trains against the owner of animals which are negligently allowed to run at large in violation of law[59] or in the immediate vicinity of a dangerous crossing where it was probable that they would go upon the track.[60] However, the owner of the animal, even though negligent, is not liable if the railroad was also negligent in the operation of the train[61] or had failed in its statutory duty to fence the track.[62]

§ 698. Incompetency, Negligence, or Misconduct of Employees

A railroad company is liable, in cases of injuries resulting from accidents to trains, for the incompetency of its employees, and for all acts, negligent or willful, if performed within the scope of their employment

In cases of injuries resulting from collisions or accidents to trains, a railroad company is liable for the incompetency of its employees,[63] and for all acts done by them, whether negligent,[64] or willful or malicious,[65] if performed within the scope of their employment,[66] and even though the particular act or means employed may have been unauthorized.[67] However, the railroad will not be liable for injuries resulting from unauthorized acts not within the scope of the servant's employment.[68]

§ 699. Negligence or Wrongful Acts of Third Persons

A railroad company is not liable for accidents to trains caused by the negligent or wrongful acts of third persons not in its employ and done without its knowledge or consent.

A railroad company is not liable for injuries due to collisions or accidents to its trains caused by the negligent or wrongful acts of third persons not in the employ of the company and done without its knowledge or consent,[69] even where such third persons are discharged employees[70] and the injury is an indirect result of the discharge.[71] However, where such third persons are acting in a particular transaction related to the railroad's business under the direction of the servants of the railroad, the railroad is responsible for the injury resulting therefrom.[72]

The plaintiff, prosecuting an action to recover for injury in connection with an accident to a train, ordinarily cannot recover if his own negligence or wrongful act contributed directly to produce the injury complained of

In accordance with general rules as to contributory negligence, plaintiff, prosecuting an action to recover for injury in connection with an accident to a train, cannot recover if his own negligence or wrongful act contributed directly to produce the injury complained of.[73] This rule applies to actions by one railroad company against another railroad, or street railroad, company,[74] or against a consignee to whom it has delivered goods,[75] for damages to its trains; to actions by passengers[76] or employees[77] of one company against the other

(1) Where plaintiff engineer failed to stop within four hundred feet from crossing as required by statute. —Foulkes v Chicago, St. P., M & O Ry. Co., 40 N.W 2d 507, 256 Wis 146

(2) Where engineer of an engine operating on his employer's industrial tracks failed to look out for engines of defendant's railroad which engaged in switching operations on such tracks—Nashville, C & St. L Ry. Co. v. Skelton, 173 S.W.2d 943, 26 Tenn App 525.

(3) Where plaintiff engineer in exercise of ordinary care must have observed that defendant's engineer was not going to perform his statutory duty at time when at plaintiff's slow speed there was still time to have avoided collision.—Foulkes v Chicago, St. P., M & O. Ry. Co, supra

(4) Other cases see 52 C J. p 163 note 3 [a].

(1) Where the engineer of an industrial train colliding with a rail-

company; to actions by motormen or drivers of street cars against railroad companies;[78] to actions by railroad employees against third persons for injuries due to obstructing the tracks,[79] and to actions by licensees on tracks or engines.[80] Contributory negligence barring plaintiff's recovery is based on the standard of ordinary care,[81] even in the case of employees on passenger trains,[82] as applied to plaintiff's acts at the time and place of the accident.[83]

Negligence of fellow servant. An employee of one company who was not himself negligent is not precluded from recovering against another company for its negligence by the fact that the negligence of a coemployee contributed to produce the injury,[84] the fellow-servant doctrine, discussed in Master and Servant §§ 321–333, having no application to actions for personal injuries not brought against the common master.[85] Of course, where the coemployee's negligence is the sole contributing cause, the employee cannot recover, defendant in such case not being guilty of negligence causing the injury.[86]

Contributory negligence as proximate cause. Contributory negligence, in order to bar recovery, must contribute directly as a proximate cause of the injury.[87] However, mere negligence on the part of plaintiff, even though contributing to the injury, will not preclude a recovery for wanton or willful misconduct on the part of defendant,[88] or for failure of defendant to stop in time to avoid the collision, when it could have done so after it had discovered, or should have discovered, that plaintiff was in danger,[89] or for negligence under the circumstances specified in a statute allowing recovery by plaintiff notwithstanding his contributory negligence.[90]

§ 701. Proximate Cause

In actions for damages or injuries due to train accidents, there can be no recovery unless defendant's negligence was a proximate cause of the injury complained of.

In actions for damages or personal injuries due to collisions or accidents to trains, there can be no recovery, although defendant was negligent, unless such negligence was a proximate cause of the injury complained of,[91] and, where the injury is caused by the intervening wrongful act of an outsider, defendant, although negligent, is not liable.[92] However, defendant's negligence will be held a proximate cause of any resulting injury occurring without the intervention of any independent agency which was the natural and probable result of such negligence.[93] It is not necessary that the particular injury which in fact occurred should have been foreseen,[94] nor is it necessary that de-road train on a track jointly used by both railroads attempted to apply brakes of his train in an improper manner when confronted with an emergency arising from approach of railroad's train on the same track, and where he was proceeding at a speed of six miles an hour—Alford v. Louisiana & A. Ry. Co., La.App., 38 So.2d 258.

Plaintiff's duty of care

Motorman of trolley car approaching railroad grade crossing was bound to use care and caution of reasonably prudent man under circumstances to ascertain whether train was approaching, and was not justified in relying wholly on fact that gates were up, but was required to make reasonable use of his faculties to ascertain whether train was approaching.—Lane v. Boston & M. R. R., 192 N.E. 597, 288 Mass. 277.

Contributory negligence shown

Where street car motorman had a clear view down railroad track and, had he looked, would have seen rapidly approaching train and could have stopped slowly moving street car in place of safety; and fact that street car was stopped across railroad side track did not require motorman to attempt to cross in front of rapidly approaching train, where there was no danger while on side track, so as to relieve motorman of contributory negligence.—Tate v. fendant's negligence, in order to be a proximate cause, should be the sole cause of the injury, a person being injured by the concurring negligence of two railroad companies being entitled to recover against either,[95] and the contributing negligence of plaintiff not barring recovery against a defendant who, notwithstanding plaintiff's fault, could have prevented the collision and negligently failed to do so.[96]

§ 702. Actions

Rules governing proceedings in civil actions generally have been applied in actions growing out of collisions or accidents to trains, with respect to pleadings, as discussed infra § 703, evidence infra § 704, trial infra §§ 705–707, and damages infra § 709.

§ 703. —— Pleading

a. In general
b. Plea or answer and subsequent pleadings
c. Issues, proof, and variance

a. In General

In actions for damage or injury growing out of collisions or accidents to trains, the complaint must allege sufficient facts to show a cause of action.

Rules as to the sufficiency of declarations and complaints in civil actions generally have been applied in actions for damage to property or personal injuries growing out of collisions or accidents to trains[97] Accordingly, the complaint must allege sufficient facts to show a cause of action in favor of plaintiff against defendant,[98] and it must allege facts showing a wanton or intentional injury,[99] or failure to use due care to prevent a collision after discovering the danger,[1] as the case may be, where such is the theory of recovery relied on The complaint must allege facts and not mere inferences or arguments,[2] and must not be uncertain or repugnant in its allegations.[3] While there must be an allegation of negligence on the part of defendant,[4] a general allegation that the act which caused the injury was negligently done or omitted is sufficient without setting out the details of the negligence.[5] However, the act complained of must be stated,[6] and, if the complaint undertakes to set out the details of the negligence causing the injury, its sufficiency must be tested by these special allegations.[7] If the negligent act and defendant's responsibility therefor are sufficiently set forth, it is not necessary to set out specifically defendant's duty in the premises,[8] or the authority of the servants whose acts resulted in the injury,[9] or that the servants of defendant were acting within the line or scope of their authority.[10]

Violation of statute, ordinance, or rules. Where the negligence relied on is the violation of a statute or ordinance, the allegation must follow the words of,[11] but need not negative the exceptions made by,[12] the statute. An allegation of the existence of the ordinance is sufficient, and the filing of a copy with the complaint is not necessary.[13]

Contributory negligence. In most jurisdictions the complaint need not negative contributory negligence on the part of plaintiff;[14] but, where such allegation is made or necessary, a general allegation that the injury occurred without any fault or negligence on the part of plaintiff is sufficient[15]

unless the inference of negligence arises as a necessary legal conclusion from the facts stated.[16] However, no such negligence on the part of plaintiff is disclosed by his allegations that he proceeded over a railroad crossing in front of an approaching train where the declaration also states that there was a dense fog.[17] In an action by a passenger of one railroad company against another for injuries caused by a collision, it is not necessary to allege that the company carrying plaintiff was without fault.[18]

Action against several defendants. Where an action is brought against several defendants, the complaint must charge the negligent acts specifically against the particular defendant or defendants alleged to be guilty thereof;[19] and whether the negligent acts of several defendants are declared on as joint or several depends on the form of the allegations.[20]

b. Plea or Answer and Subsequent Pleadings

General rules as to the sufficiency of pleas or answers and subsequent pleadings apply in actions for damage or injury growing out of collisions or accidents to trains.

Rules governing the sufficiency of pleas or answers and subsequent pleadings in civil actions generally have been held to apply to such pleadings in actions for damage to property or personal injuries growing out of collisions or accidents to trains,[21] and to demurrers thereto.[22]

Violation of rules by plaintiff. Where defendant sets up in defense a violation of rules by plaintiff, defendant must set out in his plea, if the rules alleged to have been violated are the rules of plaintiff's employer, that they were made for defendant's benefit, or that defendant was in some way connected therewith,[23] or, if they are defendant's rules, that plaintiff, employed by another road, was subject to them.[24]

c. Issues, Proof, and Variance

In order to authorize a recovery in actions for damage to property or personal injuries growing out of collisions or accidents to trains there must be proof in support of all the material allegations of the complaint.

In accordance with rules governing issues, proof, and variance in civil actions generally, and particularly in negligence actions, in order to authorize a recovery in actions for damage to property or personal injuries growing out of collisions or accidents to trains there must be proof in support of all the material allegations of the complaint;[25] but an immaterial allegation not essential to establish the cause of action need not be proved.[26] The allegations and proof must correspond and any material variance is fatal to a recovery,[27] so that there can be no recovery on a cause of action different from that alleged in the complaint,[28] and if the complaint sets out the particular acts of negligence constituting such cause of action the issues must be restricted to the acts specified.[29] However, no variance should be regarded as material where the allegations and proof substantially correspond or the variance was not such as to mislead or prejudice the other party.[30]

Under a complaint alleging "wrongful, wanton, or intentional negligence" on the part of defendant's employees, plaintiff may recover on proof of wantonness or willfulness not amounting to intentional wrongdoing;[31] and, under a petition charging that defendant's trainmen neglected to stop until the collision causing the injury, plaintiff may recover on the basis of the issue of last fair chance being in the case.[32] In jurisdictions where contributory negligence is matter of defense, it is for defendant to establish plaintiff's contributory negligence by proof, as appears infra § 704 a, but plaintiff's own evidence may be considered in determining this question and may be sufficient to show contributory negligence.[33]

Evidence admissible under pleadings Evidence, in order to be admissible, must conform to the allegations of the complaint, and, if the complaint specifies the acts of negligence relied on, evidence of negligence in other respects is not admissible;[34] but evidence of defects in the roadbed other than that alleged to have been the immediate cause of the injury complained of is admissible in support of an allegation of gross negligence as to the condition of the roadbed and a claim for exemplary damages,[35] and evidence not admissible to prove negligence not charged against one defendant may still be admissible as tending to show that the other defendant was free from blame.[36] Under a complaint alleging negligence of defendant's employees operating and in charge of its train, evidence of negligence on the part of any one of the employees is admissible, the complaint not charging joint negligence of them all.[37] An ordinance is not admissible in evidence unless specially pleaded if the action is based on the ordinance, but is admissible in a common-law action as evidence of negligence, where the ordinance does not itself give the right of action but merely prescribes a duty to be performed.[38]

§ 704. —— Evidence

a. Presumptions and burden of proof
b Admissibility
c. Weight and sufficiency

a. Presumptions and Burden of Proof

The burden of proof on particular issues is on the person setting up the affirmative and seeking a benefit therefrom. Generally no presumption of the defendant's negligence arises from the fact of collision, but there is a presumption that the plaintiff performed his duty and used due care.

In accordance with rules governing presumptions and burden of proof in civil actions, the burden of proof on particular issues in actions for damage to property or personal injuries growing out of collisions or accidents to trains is on the person setting up the affirmative and seeking a benefit therefrom,[39] as, for example, on plaintiff, who has alleged subsequent negligence, to show that defendant's trainmen discovered the peril in time to have averted the collision,[40] but on a defendant, who has alleged that a crossing is equipped with interlocking switches and so within the exception to the statutory rule requiring stopping before crossing, to prove the facts bringing the crossing within the exception.[41]

As to defendant's negligence. While, as between a passenger and the railroad carrying him, a presumption of negligence arises from the fact of collision, as discussed in Carriers § 764 f (2), the rule, except in so far as a statute provides otherwise,[42] is that as between a passenger on one road and another railroad,[43] or an employee of one road during the course of his employment and another railroad,[44] a presumption of negligence on the part of the second railroad does not arise from the fact of collision In such cases the burden is on plaintiff, unaided by any presumption, to establish defendant's negligence,[45] and that it was the proximate cause of the injury.[46] However, where the cause of the collision is shown to have been some agency within the control of defendant railroad, a presumption of negligence, not from the collision but from the proved cause of the collision, does arise which defendant must meet,[47] but defendant cannot in such case claim as against an employee of another railroad the benefit of a presumption, available to it as against its own employees, discussed in Master and Servant § 501 a

(4), that the car was properly equipped with brakes [48]

As to contributory negligence. Where the question of performance of duty by plaintiff is involved in an issue of contributory negligence, there is a presumption of performance of duty and of due care,[49] which is strengthened wherever there is evidence in the case supporting the presumption,[50] and under the proper circumstances various other presumptions may be indulged [51] In jurisdictions where contributory negligence is matter of defense, the burden is on defendant to establish it [52]

b. Admissibility

General rules as to the admissibility of evidence apply in actions growing out of collisions or accidents to trains.

Rules governing the admissibility of evidence in civil actions generally, and particularly in negligence actions, have been applied in actions growing out of collisions or accidents to trains.[53] Evidence, in order to be admissible, must consist of statements of fact as distinguished from expressions of opinion,[54] unless in the form of expert testimony from one qualified to give it;[55] and it must be relevant to the matters in issue.[56] However, evidence not admissible to establish grounds of recovery may still be admissible to show conditions at the time, and in explanation or rebuttal of other evidence.[57] Thus, while evidence of other distinct acts of negligence not contributing to the injury is not admissible as tending to prove the negligence causing the injury,[58] it may be admissible for other purposes,[59] such as to test the memory of a witness.[60] Evidence of other wrecks or accidents occurring at other places is not admissible,[61] but, in case of accidents alleged to be due to defects in the track or switches, evidence is admissible of other accidents at the same place from the same cause if accompanied by proof that the condition existing at such times was substantially the same [62]

While generally speaking the evidence should be limited to the time, place, and circumstances of the particular accident complained of,[63] this rule cannot be applied with absolute strictness.[64] So in actions based on a defective condition of the track, roadbed, switches, or signal devices, evidence as to their condition shortly before or after the accident is admissible as tending to show their condition at that time;[65] but the evidence is not admissible if it relates to a time too remote to permit a just and fair inference that the condition was substantially the same at the time of the accident[66] unless it is accompanied by other direct evidence to this effect.[67] It is also ordinarily held that evidence is not admissible as to defects in the track or roadbed at places other than that where the accident occurred and which it is not shown could have contributed to the injury complained of,[68] even though they are in the same vicinity.[69] On the other hand, such evidence has been admitted to rebut evidence as to condition at other places introduced by the adverse party,[70] or where the adverse party by immediate repairs at the place of the accident has made evidence of condition at the time and place of the accident impossible,[71] or where it is charged that defendant permitted its road to become wholly unsafe for travel over it and both actual and exemplary damages are claimed,[72] or when the negligence alleged is in operating a train at a rapid speed over a defective track[73]

Ordinances. A municipal ordinance limiting the rate of speed of trains is admissible on the issue of defendant's negligence in the operation of the train,[74] and also on the question of contributory negligence on the part of a person in charge of a street car in using a railroad crossing,[75] but such an ordinance is not admissible to charge an employee on a train with contributory negligence where he had nothing to do with its operation[76]

Rules. Rules of the railroad with respect to the operation of trains under conditions similar to those at the time the accident occurred are admissible[77] in the absence of evidence of annulment and notice of annulment to plaintiff employee who was governed thereby.[78] However, evidence is not admissible of rules adopted after the accident requiring certain precautions under similar conditions.[79] Rules made by a board of railroad commissioners governing the movement of trains at crossings are not admissible unless it is shown that they have been served on, or in some manner brought to the knowledge of, the company against which they are offered in evidence,[80] and the printed rules of the railroad are not admissible to show contributory negligence on the part of an engineer in the absence of evidence that such rules were in force at the time of the injury and applied to the place where it occurred.[81]

Contracts between railroads governing the operation of their trains, if relevant to the issue, are admissible,[82] as, for example, a contract between a steam railroad and a street railway governing operations at crossings providing that the streetcars should be stopped and the way ascertained to be clear before crossing,[83] or a contract exempting the railroad from any duty to protect the cars and employees of the street railway company,[84] or a contract between two railroad companies that one of them shall stop its trains before crossing and give the other company the right of way[85]

Custom or usage. Evidence as to prevailing customs or usages in the operation of trains has been held to be admissible.[86] Thus, in case of a collision between the trains of two companies in a switch yard, evidence of the environment and usual manner of conducting the business involved at the place of injury is competent as bearing on the acts and conduct of the parties;[87] but evidence of the use of interlocking switches and signal devices at other crossings is not admissible to show negligence for failure to install them at the crossing where the accident happened, in the absence of evidence showing similarity of conditions and operating requirements at this and other crossings[88]

Repairs after collision Evidence of repairs or alterations made after the accident complained of is not admissible as evidence of a defective or insufficient condition existing at that time or an admission of negligence on the part of the company,[89] although there is some authority to the contrary;[90]

nor is evidence of reconstruction in a different manner admissible as an admission of original negligent construction.[91] However, such evidence if properly limited to the purpose for which it is introduced is admissible to rebut evidence on the part of defendant that no repairs or alterations had been made after the accident,[92] or that the conditions causing the accident could not have been prevented,[93] or for the purpose of explaining other evidence.[94]

c. Weight and Sufficiency

General rules as to the weight and sufficiency of evidence apply in actions growing out of collisions or accidents to trains.

Rules governing the weight and sufficiency of evidence in civil actions generally, and particularly in negligence actions, have been applied in actions for property damage or personal injuries growing out of collisions or accidents to trains.[95] Accordingly, in order to authorize a verdict for plaintiff there must be some evidence tending to show negligence on the part of defendant and that such negligence was the cause of the injury complained of,[96] and freedom from negligence on the part of plaintiff contributing thereto, where that issue has been made.[97]

§ 705. —— Questions of Law and Fact

It is ordinarily for the jury to determine questions of fact where the evidence is conflicting or subject to different conclusions, such as questions as to defendant's negligence, plaintiff's contributory negligence, and proximate cause.

Questions of fact in actions for property damage or personal injuries growing out of collisions or accidents to trains are ordinarily for the jury to determine where there is any evidence reasonably tending to support the issues made by the pleadings,[98] or where the evidence is conflicting or different conclusions might reasonably be drawn therefrom.[99] On the other hand, if there is no evidence reasonably tending to support the issues,[1] or if the evidence is undisputed and of a character to admit of only one conclusion therefrom,[2] the question is one of law for the court to determine without the intervention of a jury. Thus, where there is no evidence produced to sustain the material allegations of the complaint, a nonsuit is properly granted,[3] or the court may direct a verdict for defendant;[4] but the failure to prove an immaterial averment is not ground for directing a verdict.[5]

Negligence. It is ordinarily a question for the jury whether, under all the facts and circumstances shown, defendant was guilty of negligence[6] or of noncompliance with statutory requirements.[7]

7. Or.—Varley v. Consolidated Timber Co., 139 P.2d 584, 172 Or. 157.

Whether the negligence of defendant was wanton[8] or continued after he saw the peril, when in the exercise of reasonable care he might have avoided the collision,[9] is generally a question of fact for the jury However, the question of negligence should not be submitted to the jury where the evidence thereon is legally insufficient.[10]

Contributory negligence It is ordinarily a question for the jury whether plaintiff was guilty of a failure to exercise due care under the circumstances,[11] which contributed to the injury complained of;[12] nor will the fact that plaintiff's testimony is the only testimony in the case negativing contributory negligence affect the operation of this rule[13] Also for the jury is the question whether plaintiff, admittedly in the exercise of due care up to the time of discovering the danger, used due care thereafter in avoiding the collision[14] As between an employee of one railroad or street railroad and another railroad, it is generally a question of fact for the jury whether the employee observed rules and regulations,[15] and whether the employee's nonobservance of rules was a want of due care,[16] especially where the rule places no absolute duty on the engineer but makes the operation of the train under conditions stated a matter of his judgment and discretion.[17] Even where the violation of the rule constitutes a want of due care on the part of plaintiff, the question whether or not it contributed to the injury may be, and ordinarily is, a question of fact for the jury[18] The existence of facts and conditions bearing on the issue of plaintiff's due care is a question of fact for the jury where the evidence is conflicting[19]

Proximate cause. Whether defendant's negligence was the proximate cause of the injury complained of is ordinarily a question of fact for the jury.[20]

General rules as to instructions apply in actions growing out of collisions or accidents to trains.

Rules governing instructions in actions generally, have been applied in actions to recover for injuries received in a collision or accident to trains.[21] Thus, they have been applied to instructions as to the liability of a railroad company to a passenger on a car of a street railway company injured in a collision,[22] or to a passenger of another railroad waiting at a station and injured in a panic resulting from a collision,[23] or to an employee of another railroad,[24] or to the separate liability of two railroads responsible for the collision.[25] So also, these rules have been applied in the giving of instructions on various issues in such cases,[26] as, for example, the degree of care required to be exercised under certain conditions;[27] the alleged failure of the engineer to use ordinary care in approaching a crossing,[28] or after seeing a street car,[29] or other train,[30] in danger; his failure to run his train within the proper speed limit[31] or to stop it before crossing;[32] his failure to give warning while backing his train[33] or to have the headlight lit at night,[34] and his failure to observe rules and warnings.[35]

General rules as to verdicts and findings apply in actions for injuries resulting from collisions and accidents to trains.

General rules relating to verdicts and findings have been applied in actions to recover for injuries resulting from railroad collisions and accidents to trains.[36] As in cases of a general verdict with special findings, ordinarily all the presumptions are in favor of the general verdict, and if the two can be reconciled judgment must follow the general verdict.[37]

§ 708. —— Appeal and Error

The rules governing appellate review of actions to recover for property damage or personal injuries received in collisions or accidents to trains, as well as of other actions, are discussed in Appeal and Error.

§ 709. —— Damages

In actions for damages arising out of collisions or accidents to trains, the amount recoverable ordinarily is limited to compensation for injuries or loss which is the natural and probable consequence of the negligence alleged.

XVII. ACCIDENTS AT CROSSINGS

A. CARE REQUIRED AND LIABILITY IN GENERAL

§ 710. Rights and Duties at Crossings Generally

In general, the liability of a railroad company for injuries resulting from an accident at a crossing depends on whether there was negligence authorizing a recovery, or contributory negligence preventing a recovery, in the light of the particular facts and circumstances.

It has been said that crossing accidents are sui generis in the field of negligence, bringing into sharp focus the reciprocal duties of those seeking to use the intersection, nonobservance of which may result in disaster.[44] Railroad grade crossings in particular, it has been judicially observed, are more or less dangerous.[45] Each grade crossing case depends on its own facts and circumstances,[46] and, in the case of a collision between a train and a motor vehicle, liability must be determined not on the basis of whether the train struck the vehicle, or whether the vehicle struck the train,[47] but on the basis of whether, under all the facts, there was negligence authorizing recovery or contributory negligence preventing recovery.[48] The legal principles applicable to a crossing accident between a railway car or train and a traveler are not determined by the motive power involved, but by the physical surroundings.[49] The railroad company is not responsible for the inherent danger arising from the existence of a railroad grade crossing unless it unnecessarily causes or increases it by some unlawful act or willful or negligent omission of duty.[50] On the other hand, the railroad does not necessarily escape liability by the fact that the accident was unforeseen and that many persons have passed over the same spot without injury.[51]

Failure to attend injured person. Failure of the railroad employees to stop the train and attend to a person struck thereby at a crossing authorizes no recovery against the railroad, unless the employees were aware of such person's presence on the track before or after the accident.[52]

§ 711. —— Care Required of Railroad in General

The railroad must exercise care commensurate with the danger involved at a crossing, and must comply with statutory and municipal regulations; but it is not an insurer of the safety of persons approaching the tracks.

While railroads are not insurers of the safety of persons approaching their tracks,[53] a railroad company's employees in charge of a train should use all ordinary and reasonable care to avoid injury to a traveler on the highway desiring to cross the track;[54] and a railroad company is under a duty

Duties of automobile and train operators.

Where train and automobile approached public crossing at approximately the same time, certain duties were imposed on operators of automobile and train, and the resulting rights, duties, and obligations were required to be ascertained on the basis of that primary fact.—Truelove v. (1) The violation of a duty required of a railroad at a public crossing is negligence per se.—Callaway v. Cox, 40 S.E.2d 578, 74 Ga. App. 555.

(2) In action against railroad company to recover damages for personal injuries sustained by guest passenger in automobile as result of collision between automobile and train, where no statute or city ordinance had been violated, railroad was not guilty of negligence per se.—Watson v. Fact of collision.

Although the evidence would indicate with reasonable certainty that death was caused by a collision with a train, even at a railroad crossing, this fact alone does not authorize a recovery from railroad.—Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Adams' Adm'x, 190 S.W.2d 690, 301 Ky. 7.

Care required in running or operating at crossings see infra § 732.

to take adequate measures for the safety of the traveling public at a railroad crossing, although no particular safety device has been specified by statute or by official order of a governmental agency.[55] The speed of modern transportation carries with it concomitant perils and corresponding obligations to the public to exercise the higher degree of care necessary for the protection of persons and property on, or in dangerous proximity to, the railroad tracks.[56] The measure of duty owed by the railroad company is fixed by the law of the land,[57] and the private rules of the company cannot be set up by an injured person for the purpose of founding a substantive cause of action based on a breach thereof.[58]

The care and precautions taken by a railroad at a crossing must be commensurate with the danger involved.[59] Where a crossing is unusually dangerous, the railroad must exercise such reasonable care as common prudence dictates,[60] and may be under a duty to use exceptional means to warn and avoid injuring travelers,[61] the character of the means depending on what would be reasonably necessary under the facts of the particular situation.[62] The test of whether a railroad crossing is unusually dangerous has been said to be the ability of the traveler to observe the approach of a train from the direction in which it is coming;[63] and the fact that the amount of travel over a crossing at the time of an accident was extremely light does not, in itself, necessarily remove the crossing from the category of unusually hazardous crossings.[64]

Statutory or other governmental regulations. The duties of a railroad company with respect to crossings are frequently made the subject of statutory or other regulation,[65] and some regulations prescribing the duty of a railroad at a crossing are applicable alike to public roads or private ways.[66] While precautions in addition to statutory requirements may be required at extrahazardous or peculiarly and unusually dangerous crossings,[67] there is no hard and fast rule in railroad crossing cases for determining whether statutory minima satisfy the requirements of due care or whether additional precautions are required,[68] and each case should be determined with respect to its own facts and circumstances.[69] Thus, in some situations due care has been held not to require the railroad to exercise any precautions at the crossing in addition to those prescribed by the regulations,[70] whereas in other situations such regulations have been held not to be the sole standard for determining the question of whether due care has been observed by the railroad.[71] Persons crossing the track of a railroad company at a public crossing are entitled to the protection of the statutes regulating the approach of trains to such a crossing, without regard to the manner in which the road or highway was established,[72] but it is essential that the public character of the crossing be established.[73]

§ 712. —— Care Required at Public Crossings

Railroads are required to exercise reasonable or ordinary care at public crossings in the light of the surroundings and the extent of user, and commensurate with the danger involved.

public crossings,[74] and are bound, even in the absence of specific statutory requirements, to exercise reasonable[75] or ordinary[76] care, dependent on the situation and surroundings of the crossing and the extent of user[77] and commensurate with the danger involved.[78] A different case is made on a claim of primary negligence if the accident occurs at a public crossing rather than at a private one,[79] and the character of a crossing as a public or a private crossing is to be determined by the nature of its use rather than the quantum.[80] The mere fact that a number of persons are in the habit of using a certain place as a crossing where there is no public right of passage does not constitute such place a public crossing,[81] even though the railroad company acquiesces in such use.[82]

A railroad has no right to expect a clear track at a public crossing,[83] it is bound to take notice that the public uses the crossing and that a failure to exercise care for the safety of travelers may place them in great danger.[84] Where there is a path open to, and adversely used by, the public for such a period of time as will vest in members of the public the right to use it as a public way by prescription, one on such way is entitled to the same care from the railroad as in the case of one on a highway.[85]

Ordinary use

§ 713. —— Care Required at Private Crossings

A railroad company must exercise reasonable or ordinary care at a private crossing, at least with respect to persons authorized to use the crossing; but there has been held to be no obligation on the company to protect such a crossing for the benefit of the general public.

With respect to persons rightfully using a private crossing,[87] as where they are within the number or class authorized to use it,[88] the duty of the railroad company is similar to its duty as to users of public crossings, and as to them, it must exercise reasonable[89] or ordinary[90] care, commensurate with the danger of the particular situation.[91] Thus, a railroad which has negligently constructed a private crossing may be liable for injuries sustained where an ordinarily prudent person would have apprehended that the probable result of its negligent construction would be injury to persons lawfully using it.[92]

According to some cases the liability of the railroad for failure to exercise reasonable care at a private crossing does not extend to instances in which the injury is sustained by one not entitled or invited to use such crossing,[93] notwithstanding the use is permitted by the railroad company,[94] and, thus, it has been held that a railroad owes no duty to repair a defective farm crossing over a railroad to anyone but the owner of the farm, his family, and servants.[95] Inasmuch as private crossings are constructed for the accommodation of individuals, there is ordinarily no obligation on a railroad to protect such crossings for the benefit of the public,[96] or to afford special crossing protection at such place.[97]

A landowner for whose benefit a private crossing is maintained cannot, by granting to another permission to use it for such other's benefit or business, impose a liability on the railroad company in respect of such use;[98] nor in such case does the invitation of the railroad company include user not contemplated when the right to such crossing was reserved.[99] Where the right of the person injured to be on a private crossing is derived through the right of a business concern with which he is doing business or by which he is employed, the duty of the railroad to the injured person ordinarily is measured by its obligation to the concern,[1] at least where there is nothing in the contract under which the crossing was established and maintained whereby any relationship of principal and agent was created as between the railroad and the concern.[2]

Mutual advantage to the railroad company and to the person for whom the crossing is constructed and maintained is not necessary, according to some cases, in order that an invitation may be implied,[3]

Use by general public unnecessary

In order to impose a duty of care on the railroad, it is not essential that the use of a private way or crossing be by the general public but it is sufficient if the use is by the people of a certain neighborhood or community or certain designated persons.—Louisville & N R Co. v. Patterson, 42 S E 2d 163, 75 Ga.App. 1.

Where railroad leased premises adjacent to private crossing to lessee, and lease provided that "lessee agrees to use said premises only for the location of a camp and not to place or allow to be placed on any part of the demised premises any advertisements, signs or posters without written consent of lessor," provision restricting use of premises including right to travel over crossing was for benefit of railroad which could waive it—O'Brien v Boston & M R. but the invitation may be implied from the fact of advantage alone to such person[4] However, there is authority for the view that some invitation on the part of the railroad company is necessary,[5] and that a private crossing cannot be created except by contract, express or implied, between the railroad and some one on whom a right to cross the tracks is conferred[6] It has been held that the railroad company is not liable as it might be in respect of a public crossing where the accident occurred at a private crossing constructed without the consent of the railroad company.[7]

§ 714. —— Care Required at Crossings by Recognition or Invitation

Trainmen are under a duty to use reasonable or ordinary care for the safety of persons crossing the tracks at a place which the railroad company has recognized as a public crossing or has invited or permitted the public to use as such for an extended period.

Where acts on the part of the railroad company amount to a recognition of the place as a public crossing, or to an invitation to the public to use it as such,[8] or where with the railroad's consent the public has used the place as a crossing for an extended period,[9] the duty of the railroad is controlled by rules analogous to those applicable to public crossings Thus, the train operator is usually required to anticipate the presence of persons and vehicles on such a crossing[10] and to use reasonable[11] or ordinary[12] care for the safety of persons using such a crossing.

In the absence of an express invitation to use a crossing it must appear that the travelers were impliedly invited to use the crossing by some allurement or inducement held out by the railroad,[13] and

Special equipment

Where special equipment is maintained on right of way of railroad with its knowledge and express consent to facilitate crossing tracks at place not public crossing, and equipment induces public in considerable numbers to use place as crossing, equipment may be taken as implying invitation to public to make use thereof —Stike v. Virginian Ry. Co, 174 S E. 418, 144 W Va 832.

Permissive crossing or way held not shown

(1) In general —Miller v. Pennsylvania R Co, 39 A 2d 576, 350 Pa 424.

(2) Path across vacant lands between coal car storage yards, leading up to but without definite way across yards, was held not permissive way so as to render railroad liable for injuries to person crossing yards —Koontz v Baltimore & O. R. Co, 163 A. 212, 309 Pa. 122.

mere passive acquiescence in, or absence of objection by the railroad company to, the use made of the crossing by the public is not equivalent to an invitation or inducement[14] Proof of open, notorious, and frequent use is only a part of what is required to show that a crossing is permissive,[15] it is also necessary to prove that the circumstances indicate acquiescence by the railroad[16] It is not essential to the doctrine of implied invitation that the use cover the period of years necessary for the acquirement of a prescriptive right;[17] the invitation once extended, whether implied or express, gives right to an immediate use which continues until withdrawn[18] or until the user, if he can prove the necessary elements of prescription, obtains such a right[19]

Lines or limits. Generally speaking, a permissive right of way over a railroad track must be confined within definite lines and not spread out over open ground in many divergent directions,[20] but if, at a given point, there is a defined and limited area of crossing which has been habitually used for many years, the rights of those using it cannot be impaired by the mere fact that other crossings, not so well defined or limited, may exist at other places along the track.[21]

Effect of closing crossing.. The company may relieve itself from liability on the theory of inducement or invitation to the public by removing the crossing and fencing the way leading to it.[22]

§ 715. —— Status and Rights of Persons Using Crossings

The liability of a railroad company for injury resulting from an accident at a crossing may depend on whether the traveler was using the crossing as an invitee or as a mere licensee or trespasser, since the only duties the railroad owes to mere licensees or trespassers are to use due care after knowledge of the impending danger and to avoid inflicting willful or wanton injury.

While a railroad company owes a duty of exercising reasonable care with respect to a person traversing a railroad crossing as an invitee,[23] the duty of care owed by a railroad company to rightful users of a highway does not extend to trespassers or bare licensees, or at least the degree of care is different,[24] and, hence, the liability of the railroad for injury resulting from an accident at a crossing may depend on whether the traveler was using the crossing as an invitee or as a bare licensee or trespasser[25] Where the crossing is such that a person thereon is a trespasser or a mere licensee without invitation, as a general rule the only duties the railroad company owes to such person are to use due care to avoid injury after knowledge of the impending danger,[26] and not to inflict willful or wanton injury.[27] However, if the presence of a trespasser on the track at the time and place of the injury is brought about by peculiar facts and circumstances which relieve him from the guilt of a lack of ordinary care, the company may be liable for a lack of ordinary care on its part in failing to anticipate his presence and in thereafter failing to take such proper precautions for his safety as might seem reasonably necessary.[28] A duty to anticipate the presence of, and danger to, trespassers devolves on those operating the train where, from the locality, circumstances, and known habits of the public generally, there is reason to apprehend that the track in front of the locomotive may not be clear of human beings.[29] The railroad is sometimes held to be under a duty to exercise ordinary care towards a licensee.[30]

A person rightfully using a public crossing cannot be regarded as a trespasser[31] or a mere licensee.[32] Where the crossing is not a public crossing, one is not a trespasser who uses it either because of the railroad's inducement or invitation,[33] or because of its permission or implied license,[34] or, according to some cases, because of its long acquiescence in such use;[35] but according to other cases the mere fact that a number of persons are in the habit of using a certain place as a crossing where there is no public right of passage in general does not confer on a person so using it a status other than that of a trespasser[36] or bare licensee.[37] In any event, the extent of use by the public of a railroad crossing necessary to form the basis of legal liability toward one who otherwise would be a trespasser cannot be defined with exactitude,[38] and the mere use of a railroad crossing by the public does not convert the users thereof from trespassers to licensees, unless occurring at a place habitually used by the public in such large numbers that the presence of persons on the track at that place should be anticipated.[39] A person is not a trespasser in being on a track at a private crossing made by the company under a contract with the owner of the surrounding land when the road was built, and through whom such person acquires land near the track.[40] An employee who comes within the terms of an invitation extended by the railroad to his employer to come to a freight house is an invitee,[41] whereas if he does not come within the invitation, he is a mere licensee.[42]

Prior trespass or intention to trespass. The fact that one has shortly before been a trespasser on railroad property does not affect his right to use a public crossing or the duty of the railroad toward him,[43] nor, according to some cases, is the fact that the traveler intends subsequently to become a trespasser material in this connection.[44]

Particular applications. In applying the foregoing rules, various persons sustaining injury at crossing have been held to be licensees,[45] have been held

Extent of right to use crossing The right of a member of the public to use a public crossing extends to every part of the crossing[51]

§ 716. —— Mutual Rights and Duties

The rights and duties of the public and the railroad company at a public crossing are mutual, reciprocal, and correlative, and each is charged with the duty of due care to avoid injury. The railroad, however, is generally entitled to the right of way.

As a general rule the rights and duties of the public and a railroad company at a public crossing are mutual and reciprocal,[52] correlative,[53] and coextensive[54] Each must have due regard for the rights of the other,[55] and is charged with the mutual duty of exercising due care to avoid inflicting or receiving injury,[56] including the maintenance of a careful lookout for danger.[57] As sometimes stated, it is as much the duty of a person traveling on the public highway, who is about to cross a railroad track, to use ordinary care and prudence to ascertain if a train is approaching as it is the duty of the railroad company to cause warnings to be given of an approaching train to persons who may be on the public highway.[58]

The degree of diligence to be used on either side is such as a prudent person would exercise under the circumstances at the particular time and crossing in endeavoring to perform his duty,[59] and in general no greater care is required of one than of the other.[60] The duty of each is to use reasonable[61] or ordinary[62] care commensurate with the risk and danger involved,[63] as where the situation is more than ordinarily dangerous.[64]

Superior right of railroad company. While it has been laid down that the rights of the public and the rights of the railroad company are equal[65] and that neither has an exclusive right to occupy the crossing,[66] these rules are subject to the qualification that, by reason of the character and momentum of a railroad train and the requirements of public travel by means thereof, a moving train or railroad car is entitled to the preference and right of way.[67]

As has been said, when a railroad train and a person traveling on a highway each approaches a railroad crossing at the same time, it is not the duty of the company to stop its train, but it is instead the duty of the traveler, in obedience to the known custom of the country, to stop and not pass in front of the advancing train.[68]

The railroad's right of way is not absolute,[69] and does not impose on travelers the whole duty of avoiding collisions;[70] such right is dependent on, or at least does not absolve the railroad from, the giving of reasonable and timely warning of its approach[71] and the use of reasonable care to avoid a collision.[72] The right to priority must yield to the convenience of travelers when in the operation of a train it is not necessary that the operator should use the crossing[73] or when it becomes the operator's duty to clear the crossing.[74] A standing train at a public crossing has no precedence over an ordinary traveler,[75] and, in such case, the operator of the railroad and the traveler are each bound to act with due regard for the other.[76]

Reliance on other's precautions. In the first instance, both the operator of the train and the person on or approaching a crossing in regulating their conduct may be governed by the belief or expectation that the other will exercise due care[77] to a limited or reasonable extent,[78] and the operator of a train is not required to anticipate or foresee that a motorist will disregard the duties the law places on him.[79] However, neither is relieved from the duty of watching the crossing to avoid accidents by the assumption that the other is doing his or its whole duty,[80] and a failure of either to use due care will not justify the other in taking unnecessary risks or relieve such other of the duty of exercising reasonable care to avoid injury.[81]

At places not public crossings Where a crossing at a place other than a public street or highway is treated as a public crossing, the rights and duties of the railroad company and the public thereat are substantially the same as at a public crossing.[82] Thus, there is the mutual duty of exercising care to avoid an accident.[83] Each is required to use the same degree of care,[84] and the care of each increases with the danger of the situation.[85] The care required is ordinary care.[86] So, in respect of a private crossing maintained for a particular purpose, the rights and duties of the railroad and of a person authorized to use the crossing are similar to those of the railroad and the public at a public crossing.[87] Thus, in general, their rights are regarded as equal[88] subject to the right of precedence to which a moving train or car is entitled,[89] and in general the rights of each must be exercised with reasonable regard to the consistent rights of the other.[90] However, there is authority for the view that the rights of the public in a crossing in which it has only a qualified privilege are subordinate to the rights of the railroad company.[91]

§ 717. —— What Law Governs

The substantive rights and duties of the railroad company and the person who sustains injury as a result of an accident at a railroad crossing are governed by the law of the place where the accident occurs, whereas the law of the forum governs as to procedural matters.

In accordance with general rules, the substantive rights and duties of the railroad company and the person who sustains injury as a result of an accident at a crossing are determined by the laws of the place where the injury occurs,[92] whereas the law of § 718. Defects in, and Obstructions at, Crossings

a. In general
b. Extent of care required

a. In General

A railroad company charged with the duty to maintain a crossing in safe condition is liable for its negligence in failing so to do; but there is no liability in the absence of any violation of duty, as where the defects were created by others and resulted from conditions over which the railroad company had no control.

In general, sometimes by virtue of statute or ordinance, a railroad company charged with the duty of constructing or maintaining and repairing a highway crossing is liable for injuries sustained by one making a proper use of such crossing through its negligence in failing to construct or maintain the crossing in such a manner as to render it reasonably safe and convenient for the usual and ordinary purposes of the public;[94] and a failure of the railroad company to comply with the duty imposed on it by law with respect to the maintenance of a highway crossing and the approaches thereto may be negligence per se or as a matter of law.[95] The

Lex loci as applicable in:

Tort actions generally see Conflict of Laws § 12.

Negligence actions generally see Negligence § 177.

Substantive law held involved

(1) The rule that the negligence of a motorist driving his automobile onto a grade crossing ahead of an approaching train is imputed to guests in the automobile is a rule of "substantive law" rather than a "rule of evidence," and hence was applicable in action brought in one state against railroad for death of guest in automobile who was killed when automobile was struck by train in another state.—Shaffer v. New York Cent R. Co, 34 N.E 2d 792, 66 Ohio App. 417

(2) Statute of state where accident occurred, as construed by courts of that state to mean that occurrence of railroad crossing collision raises inference of negligence, is substantive law, not rule of practice and evidence—Ramey v Missouri Pac. R Co, 21 S W.2d 873, 323 Mo 662, certiorari denied Missouri Pac R Co v Ramey, 50 S Ct. 162, 280 U.S 614, 74 L Ed. 655.

Application of lex fori as to matters of procedure in negligence cases generally see Negligence § 177 b.

Particular matters of procedure

(1) Law of the forum governed the rules of evidence, burden of proof, competency of witnesses, weight of evidence, and other matters relating to the remedy—Connole v. East St. Louis & S. Ry. Co, 102 S W 2d 581, 340 Mo 690.

(2) What inferences were permissible from evidence was a matter of procedure and not of substantive law and was to be determined by the law of the forum—Peterson v Boston & M. R. R, 36 N E 2d 701, 310 Mass 45.

(3) Court applied law of forum in ruling on contention that motorist was guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law, and gave to plaintiff the benefit of the favorable evidence rule—Hopkins v Kurn, 171 S.W 2d 625, 351 Mo 41, 149 A.L. R 762.

Sufficiency of evidence for jury

Where law of place where accident occurred lays down only a general standard of care, the court in which the action is brought, while bound to observe that standard, would be required to determine in accordance with its own law of procedure whether there was sufficient evidence to take case to jury on question whether railroad conformed to the standard—Peterson v. Grading and planking or graveling

Violation of a statute dealing with the grading and planking or graveling of railroad tracks across sidewalks has been held to constitute negligence per se.—Pittsburgh, etc, duty of a railroad to exercise care with respect to crossings and their approaches may be violated either through defective or improper construction, or through a failure to remedy an unsafe condition arising after a proper and safe construction,[96] it may be through an act of commission or one of omission.[97]

Where a statute imposes the general requirement on railroads to keep their crossings safe and in repair, negligence is the basis of liability thereunder.[98] The duty imposed by some statutes on the railroad to keep crossings in proper repair and in a reasonably safe condition is absolute and nondelegable.[99] Where a statute requiring railroads to maintain crossings in good order was passed for the benefit of persons using the highway, any person injured while traveling on the highway may recover for a violation thereof.[1] The duty imposed by statute to provide suitable crossings and to maintain them in good order has been held to include crossings where the grades are separated,[2] as well as crossings at grade.[3]

The railroad company is not relieved of liability by the fact that the person injured may also have a remedy against certain county or municipal authorities,[4] or because the crossing was authorized or required by municipal ordinance,[5] or because control and supervision over the roads of the state have been vested in a highway commission,[6] or because the construction or repair was intrusted to an independent contractor,[7] or was performed by,[8] or on the authority of,[9] state or municipal authorities. Where the duty to maintain a crossing is imposed on a railroad by statute, neither a municipality[10] nor a commission[11] can relieve the railroad from its statutory duty. The determination of liability as between the railroad and the public authorities may depend on whether the crossing was constructed under statutory authority prescribing the obligations of the parties or under a contract between the railroad company and the public authorities fixing their respective duties of maintenance.[12] It has been held that if the practical equivalent of a title in fee is in the railroad company, and the easement of a right of way across the railroad in the public, the duty of maintenance, in the absence of other facts or circumstances, rests on the county;[13] whereas if the public owns title to the bed of the highway at the crossing, and the railroad company has an easement of passage across it, the duty is correspondingly reversed.[14]

In the absence of any violation of duty on the part of the railroad company, there is no basis of liability,[15] as where the defects were created by others and resulted from conditions over which the railroad company had no control,[16] or where a change is made by the county authorities without proper notice to the railroad company.[17] It has been held that the railroad company is not liable as for the violation of a duty imposed by statute where the road is not a public road within the meaning of the statute involved.[18] Recovery cannot be had on the theory of nuisance where the facts do not show a nuisance.[19] A statute requiring railroads to keep in repair the streets between its rails, and for a prescribed distance on each side in such manner as municipalities may prescribe, does not impose any greater duty than would otherwise exist, unless the municipality so prescribes [20]

Private crossing or driveway. The railroad company is liable to one making a rightful use of a private or farm crossing who is injured by the negligent failure of the railroad to comply with the duty, if any, imposed on it to construct and repair such a crossing.[21] However, the railroad is not liable for an injury sustained by one who is not entitled to the benefit of the crossing,[22] and, if there is no existing duty on the part of the railroad company to construct or to maintain in proper repair a private crossing, it is not liable for failing to do so [23] A railroad which constructs a private driveway in such fashion as might reasonably mislead a traveler into a belief that it is but a continuation of the public street is obliged to use reasonable and ordinary care in keeping the premises and approaches safe.[24]

Priority in time between railroad and highway. At common law a railroad company in constructing its road was under an obligation to provide safe and convenient crossings at highways then existing.[25] With respect to public road in existence before the railroad was built, the railroad has been held required not only to keep up the roadbed, but also to construct and maintain suitable and convenient approaches to the crossing [26] There is authority for the view that the liability of a railroad company for injuries resulting from defects in crossings may extend to injuries sustained at public crossings, whether established before or after the railroad was built,[27] particularly under statutes in effect requiring railroads to maintain crossings safely regardless of the question of priority of existence.[28] Where existing railroad lines are crossed by new highways established by government authority, the railroad must adjust itself to the new conditions and facilities provided in the public interest, and may not ignore the dangers incident to its own use of the crossing merely because it was first on the ground [29] A statute expressly imposing liability on railroad companies for injuries resulting from a noncompliance with duties in respect of crossings has been construed to apply to a situation in which the railroad was constructed before the intersecting highway was laid out.[30] The liability of the railroad company has been denied, however, where a turnpike was constructed at the same time as the railroad and the turnpike company assumed the duty of maintaining the road.[31]

Establishment of crossing. In general the railroad company is not liable for a failure to maintain in good repair or safe condition a place which is not an established crossing.[32] However, the rail-

(2) Where motorist alleged that the railroad was negligent in permitting large arc light to blind and injure view of person approaching track in automobile, the railroad could not be held negligent in permitting the arc light to be situated at public intersection where it appeared that the city alone controlled location and operation of the light.—Nabrotzky v. road company may be liable in respect of defects at a crossing which has become a public crossing or in the nature of a public crossing by invitation or custom,[33] as where the railroad company has assumed the duty of constructing and maintaining a proper crossing thereat, although it was not obliged to do so[34]

Failure to provide for changed conditions For injuries resulting from a failure to comply with its duty to make such changes and to take such precautions as changed conditions require, the railroad company may be liable[35]

Continuing nature of duty The duty of the railroad company to keep the crossings in proper condition is a continuing duty to be discharged whenever a crossing is in need of repair in order that it may be safe and convenient for the traveling public[36]

b. Extent of Care Required

In general, it is necessary and sufficient that the railroad company maintain crossings in a reasonably safe condition. A foolproof crossing, or one that will be safe under any and all circumstances, is not required.

There is no hard and fast rule to determine whether a railroad company has been guilty of negligence with respect to its alleged failure to so maintain a crossing as to be safe for people who wish to use it,[37] and the question depends on the facts and circumstances of the particular case[38] In general a railroad company is not an insurer of the safety of travelers,[39] and it is not obliged to anticipate and provide against extraordinary occurrences or dangers[40] The duty of the railroad is not absolute,[41] and it is not required to maintain a foolproof crossing[42] or a crossing whereat no injury is possible,[43] nor is it required to keep the surface of the road at the crossing so smooth as to prevent any jar or jolt to a vehicle passing over it.[44] In the absence of the imposition of an absolute duty as to the method or means to be used, it is usually sufficient for the railroad company to exercise reasonable or ordinary care, and to maintain crossings in a reasonably safe condition.[45] It is not the duty of the railroad company to maintain the crossing safe and easy under all circumstances;[46] but its duty is fulfilled if it maintains the crossing so as to permit safe and convenient passage over it by persons exercising reasonable care in the use thereof.[47]

Statute embodying common-law duty

If statute requiring railroad to maintain safe crossing is mere affirmation of common-law duty, standard of care continues to be conduct of reasonably prudent person under like circumstances.—Crawford v. Atlantic Coast Line R. Co., 184 S.E. 569, 179 S.C. 264

47. La.—Homeland Ins. Co. v. Thompson, App., 12 So.2d 62—Dantone v. Standard Mach. Co., App., 195 So. 39.

On the other hand, it is necessary that the railroad maintain crossings in a reasonably safe condition, and the exercise of less than reasonable or ordinary care will not satisfy its duty in this respect.[48] The railroad does not have the right to set a trap or snare in the crossing which might reasonably be expected to cause injury to a traveler.[49] Where the railroad company has the duty of restoring the highway, it is bound to make it reasonably safe.[50] Where the statute imposes an absolute duty to furnish a safe crossing, it seems that the mere fact that the railroad company exercised reasonable care will not relieve it from liability.[51]

Crossings by invitation or custom. In respect of crossings which as a result of invitation or custom have a status similar to public crossings, the railroad company must use reasonable[52] or ordinary[53] care to maintain it in safe condition, although the railroad company is not an insurer of the safety of persons using the crossing.[54]

Private crossings In respect of persons lawfully using private crossings, the railroad company is bound to exercise reasonable care in constructing and maintaining such crossings.[55]

§ 719. —— Nature and Location of Defect

a. Nature
b. Location

a. Nature

In general a railroad company is liable only for a defect which is caused by its negligence, and not for a condition which is not unnecessarily dangerous under ordinary circumstances or which is not due to improper construction or maintenance.

In general a railroad company is liable for a defect or condition which is caused by its negligence,[56] and which makes the crossing unnecessarily unsafe and dangerous to persons having occasion to use the crossing, while in the exercise of ordinary care.[57] The railroad company is not liable, however, for a condition which is not caused by its negligence or other fault,[58] or which is not unnecessarily dangerous or unsafe under ordinary circumstances,[59] or which is not due to improper construction or maintenance although it may be an obstacle to travel,[60] nor is the railroad company liable on the theory that it has not restored, as nearly as possible, an intersected highway to its former state merely because the angle of approach was slightly altered.[61] The mere fact that a crossing is dangerous does not necessarily impute negligence to the railroad company,[62] and the fact that a railroad crosses a street or highway at grade is not of itself sufficient to impose liability on the railroad company for an injury sustained at the crossing.[63]

Snow, ice, or rain. There has been held to be no general obligation on the part of a railroad to remove all snow from a crossing,[64] or to remove an icy condition of a crossing located in a municipality,[65] or an icy condition of the highway leading up to its tracks at a crossing.[66] Railroads have been held under a duty to keep crossings in such condition that they can be used with convenience and safety during or following a rain.[67]

Signal tower. Liability of the railroad for injuries resulting from the maintenance of a signal tower in the public highway at a railroad crossing does not depend on whether the structure was erected pursuant to mandatory order by a public service commission or pursuant to permission granted to the railroad at its request, but on whether or not the structure was lawfully in the highway.[68] If the structure is a legalized one, that is one for which definite and specific legislative authority exists, it is immaterial whether it was erected by permit or mandate.[69] On the other hand, where no authority has been conferred on a public service commission or the authorities of a municipality to order or permit the erection of the structure in the public highway, its presence there, without lights and endangering ordinary travel by night, constitutes a nuisance.[70]

b. Location

The liability of the railroad company ordinarily exists only with respect to a defect on that part of the crossing which it is under a duty to maintain. Where its duty of maintenance extends to the approaches to the crossing, it is liable for a defect therein resulting from its negligence.

The liability of the railroad company depends on whether the defect was on that part of the crossing which the company was under a duty to maintain.[71] In general the railroad company is not responsible for a defect that is beyond the limits of the street or highway.[72] However, notwithstanding the railroad company is under no duty to maintain and care for the street beyond its right of way, nevertheless, where it has undertaken to make use of it, the railroad may be liable for negligence in its performance.[73] The duty of the railroad company to furnish a suitable crossing implies the incidental duty to maintain its premises on both of the highway side lines in such manner as will not produce an unsafe condition of the crossing.[74]

A railroad company is not liable for injuries sustained in a collision between two motor vehicles because of the alleged dangerous condition of a public highway located on the railroad's right of way where sole control over the place of the collision was in the public authorities, and the railroad had no control or discretion as to the location, construction or maintenance thereof.[75] A railroad company required to maintain only that part of the crossing structure made necessary by the existence of the railroad tracks and roadbed proper has been held not liable for any defect outside the part of the highway which crosses the permanent roadbed, ties, and rails of the company.[76]

Approaches. Where the duty of the railroad company in respect of construction, restoration, or maintenance extends to the approaches to the crossing, it is liable for injuries resulting from noncompliance with such duty,[77] even though the defects are outside the railroad company's right of way.[78] An embankment constructed as a necessary approach to a railroad track is in legal contemplation a part of the crossing and should comply with the provisions regulating crossings in general.[79] On the other hand, where the duty of the railroad company does not extend to such places, it is not liable for an injury occurring on the approaches,[80] or at least on such approaches as are not made necessary by the presence of the permanent roadbed and structures thereon.[81] Even as to defects in approaches of a public road to a railroad track within the right of way, the view has been taken that the railroad company is not liable where the statute does not impose any duty on it in respect of such approaches.[82]

Width of crossing. Liability may be based on a failure of the railroad company to comply with its duty to construct a crossing of adequate width.[83] However, in the absence of statutory requirement, a railroad company is not under a duty to construct a crossing of any particular width[84] or to maintain the highway for the full width of the public highway right of way,[85] and, hence, in general, liability cannot be predicated on a failure to maintain a crossing of a greater width than the traveled portion of the intersecting highway.[86] A railroad company is not liable for a failure to keep the roadway, throughout its whole width, in a reasonably safe condition for pedestrians where it has provided a sidewalk which is reasonably safe.[87]

Sidewalk. The railroad company may be under a duty to construct or repair that part of a sidewalk crossed by its tracks, and to keep such sidewalk in a reasonably safe condition for pedestrians,[88] particularly under a statute requiring a railroad company by reason of its servitude to construct and maintain street or road crossings in such way as to make them reasonably safe for travelers,[89] but the duty of the railroad company has been held to be confined solely to defects in the sidewalk resulting from its servitude thereon.[90]

Within municipalities. A statute requiring railroads to construct and maintain crossings in good order has been held applicable to streets in a municipality;[91] but outside the crossing and the approaches thereto, the railroad company occupies the same relationship to city streets over which its right of way crosses as any fronting or abutting property owner.[92]

to remain on the crossing for an unreasonable or unlawful length of time; but generally the railroad company will not be held liable where it has not been guilty of negligence in obstructing passage over the crossing

In general the railroad company owes the duty to the public not to obstruct a crossing unnecessarily or for an unreasonable period,[93] and it may incur liability where it allows its train or cars to remain on the crossing unnecessarily, or for an unreasonable or unlawful length of time, by reason of which injuries are received by one who attempts, with due care, to cross,[94] or by one who is precluded by the obstruction from attempting to cross.[95] A railroad company may be liable for injuries caused by the erection or maintenance of an obstruction without legal authority,[96] or in such manner as to amount to negligence,[97] or where the obstruction causes delay with a resultant collision.[98] The duty of the railroad to keep the crossing clear and unobstructed is nonassignable.[99] Statutory powers of a railroad with respect to the maintenance of an obstruction in a highway must be exercised with reasonable judgment and precaution to prevent injury to others.[1]

Negligence is usually the basis of recovery, and if there is no negligence there can be no recovery.[2] The question of whether the obstruction of a highway by a standing train is negligent is determined by whether, under all the circumstances it is reasonable.[3] In the event that the railroad company has violated no duty to persons using a public crossing, in respect of the existence of an obstacle or obstruction, it is not liable for injuries sustained as the result of such obstacle or obstruction.[4] In general a railroad company has the right to stop its train or leave its cars at a public crossing for a reasonable time and for a proper purpose;[5] it is not chargeable with negligence for so doing,[6] and is not liable for injuries caused by such obstruction.[7]

Aside from statutory requirements, the care and diligence required of a railroad company in the lawful occupation of grade crossings with its trains are to be measured by the care and diligence which it has the right to assume will be exercised by travelers on the highway.[8] In general, the trainmen have a right to assume that the operator of the vehicle will act in a reasonable way to avoid a collision,[9] and are not bound to anticipate that a person will drive a vehicle into the standing train or cars[10] They have a right to assume, under ordinary conditions, that the driver of a motor vehicle on the highway, properly equipped, will see the train in time to stop,[11] and will maintain such control and speed as will enable him to stop his car within the distance within which he can plainly see the train[12]

Statutory duties of motorist

The statute governing a motorist's duties while driving on a highway should be considered on the question of primary negligence in cases where an automobile has run into the side of a train blocking a crossing, not merely as an element of contributory negligence, but as a circumstance from which to determine the question of the degree of care and caution demanded of trainmen with respect to warning traveling public of the presence of cars—Kurn v. Fog or mist

Railroad was not required to anticipate that fog or mist would make yellow refrigerator car difficult to see while train was on country crossing, but railroad was justified in assuming that if there was a mist or fog on the highway, driver of automobile would reduce his speed so that he would not travel into or

Purpose, construction, and effect of regulations The purpose of statutes, ordinances, or railroad company rules prohibiting the blocking of crossings by railroads, or limiting the time that a train should stand on a crossing, is to prevent delay to traffic,[13] and to keep the ways of communication open in order that any person desiring to use them may do so without unreasonable interference.[14] Such regulations have been held not designed to prevent vehicles from being driven against the sides of trains[15] or to impose on the railroads a greater degree of care than that required by existing law.[16] They must be construed reasonably[17] and in such manner that a railroad will not be deprived of the use of its tracks.[18] A passenger in a motor vehicle which collided with a standing car has been held to be within the class of persons for whose benefit a law was enacted prohibiting the blocking of crossings by a railroad.[19]

According to some cases, the violation of a municipal ordinance[20] or of a statute,[21] including a penal statute,[22] aimed at the undue blocking of a crossing by trains or cars, is negligence per se, for which the railroad company may be liable,[23] even though the statute is in terms directed to employees in charge of a train.[24] It has also been asserted broadly that a railroad company is civilly liable to any person sustaining a harm separate and distinct from interference with the public right of travel caused by its intentional obstruction of a street in violation of statute, regardless of whether it was guilty of common-law negligence.[25] On the other hand, according to some cases, a penal statute of this description in terms directed to employees of a railroad company does not impose a duty on the company itself,[26] therefore, negligence may not be predicated on a mere violation of such statute,[27] but depends in each case on whether or not the obstruction was reasonable.[28] The fact that the company has obstructed a crossing by one of its cars beyond the time fixed by law has been held not of itself negligence,[29] but merely a matter to be considered on the question of whether there was negligence in the operation of a train at the crossing.[30] Liability may not be predicated on an alleged violation of a statute or ordinance aimed at the undue or improper blocking of a crossing by a train or cars where the conditions are not such as to bring the case within the provisions of the statute or ordinance in question.[31] A railroad company rule limiting the time that a train should stand on a crossing does not have the force and effect of a statute and, hence, proof of a failure by the trainmen to comply with it, where nothing else is shown, is not evidence of negligence.[32]

through such mist or fog at any greater rate of speed than would enable him to stop within the distance within which he could see objects ahead of him.—Dillner v Joyce, 6 N W 2d 275, 233 Iowa 279.

and so negligence cannot be predicated of a violation of such statute where a train blocks a permissive crossing[33] It has been held, however, that, where a way across the track is constantly used by the public with the knowledge of the railroad company's employees without objection, the railroad company has the duty of exercising reasonable care to meet and avoid dangers which should be anticipated.[34] A railroad company has been held not liable for an injury to a person who crosses, under an implied invitation from the company, at a place other than a public crossing, where the injury resulted from the maintenance of an implement in the path which was necessary in the operation of the railroad[35]

Trespass. According to some cases, a railroad company which allows its train or cars to block a crossing for an unreasonable time, or for a longer time than the law permits, unless it is without fault, is a trespasser.[36]

During repairs. A railroad engaged in repairing a crossing, which requires temporary obstruction of part of the highway, is required to use ordinary care to prevent injury to others[37] It should provide a reasonably safe detour or temporary way, or direct travelers to cross by another way, or warn persons approaching the crossing of the dangers[38]

§ 721. —— Bridges or Tunnels

A railroad company is liable for a failure to comply with its duty to construct and maintain a bridge, trestle, or tunnel in a reasonably safe manner, but is not liable in the absence of a violation of a duty imposed on it.

The liability of a railroad where a public highway is led across the tracks by means of a bridge or underpass depends on the existence of a duty on its part to protect users of the crossing from injury[39] Where, at a crossing, a railroad company is bound to construct or maintain a bridge or viaduct over its track,[40] approaches to a bridge over its track,[41] a bridge, viaduct, or trestle over a highway which the railroad crosses,[42] a street, underpass, or tunnel under its track,[43] or a bridge which is an approach to, and a necessary part of, the crossing,[44] in general it will be liable if it fails to comply with its duty to construct or to maintain such bridge, trestle, tunnel, or street in a condition reasonably safe for persons using it for the purpose of crossing in the ordinary way. A like rule imposing liability applies where the company, although not obligated so to do, nevertheless undertakes to construct a bridge over a track[45] or on the approach to its track.[46]

On the other hand where there is nothing to show a violation of a duty imposed on it or which it has voluntarily assumed, liability of the railroad company cannot be predicated on claimed defects in a bridge or viaduct carrying the highway over the railroad,[47] in a bridge, trestle, or viaduct carrying the railroad over a street or highway,[48] in a tunnel carrying the highway or street under the railroad,[49] or in a bridge which is connected with, or a part of, the approach to the crossing.[50] Moreover, no liability is imposed on the company in respect of construction or maintenance where a bridge over the railroad track is safe for the ordinary needs of travel,[51] or where a bridge over railroad tracks or a railroad bridge over a street is lawfully constructed and maintained in accordance with a plan approved by municipal or other governmental authorities and the plan is not obviously unsafe or dangerous;[52] and, in this connection, the authorities can ratify the structure of a completed railroad bridge even though the bridge was not constructed as provided by the original authorizing ordinance.[53] However, an informal preliminary approval of the bridge by the highway department, followed by a formal and final order of the public service commission merely requiring the railroad to construct a bridge which shall be "safe and suitable" does not relieve the railroad from liability for negligent construction.[54] Notwithstanding statutes giving a commission power to order the construction or repair of a bridge and the terms of the installation and maintenance, the duty and obligation of the railroad remain undisturbed until the commission has assumed jurisdiction with respect to the particular crossing.[55]

In general, the duty of the railroad with respect to a bridge or viaduct is to use ordinary care to keep it in a reasonably safe condition[56] for persons

Lights

The law does not impose a duty on the railroad to maintain lights on a bridge or in its vicinity—Louisville & N R. Co. v. Evins, 13 Tenn.App 57

Obscuring of signs

Mining company, which maintained an overpass bridge over which it operated cars from which liquid dropped onto highway and onto signs erected and maintained to warn motorists of center pier, so that using ordinary care and prudence,[57] or, where its duties are prescribed by statute, to maintain the structure as specified by the statute.[58] In determining whether the railroad company has exercised due care in the maintenance of a bridge in a condition safe for travelers, consideration should be given to the physical surroundings and the condition of the roadway approaching the bridge,[59] and also to the conditions of public travel and the character of the bridge.[60] Reasonable care includes vigilance to see that a dangerous hole does not develop in the floor of a bridge by defective or decaying timbers, as well as to discover and remedy the defect after it develops.[61] Where the duty resting on the railroad is limited to keeping a bridge in repair from a structural standpoint, it is not liable for alleged defects arising from the existence of foreign objects thereon, such as ice, peelings, or other accumulations not inherently a part of the structure;[62] but the liability of railroads for the improper maintenance of bridges is not always restricted to defects of structure, and it may be the duty of the railroad to exercise reasonable care to see that the bridge is free from unsafe accumulations,[63] unless relieved of that duty by statute.[64]

Barriers or guard. A railroad company is not liable in respect of an insufficient guard rail or other barrier where the duty of maintaining such guard rail or other barrier is not imposed on it,[65] nor is it necessarily liable for an injury resulting from the giving way of a guard rail, fence, or other barrier on a bridge over the railroad tracks or on the approach to such a bridge.[66] It may, however, be liable for failure to comply with its duties to provide a sufficient guard rail or other barrier on the bridge[67] or the approach to it;[68] and the test of the sufficiency of barriers erected in connection with the maintenance of a viaduct is whether the barriers are such as a reasonably prudent person would have erected.[69]

Clearance space. While the mere fact that an accident might not have occurred if the passageway under the railroad tracks were larger is not a ground for holding the railroad company liable,[70] a railroad company may be liable for the violation of its duty to provide sufficient elevation between the highway or street and the railroad bridge or trestle crossing such streets.[71] This liability has been held to extend to cases in which the elevation is changed by others than the railroad company by raising the grade of the street,[72] but there is also authority to the contrary.[73] The railroad ordinarily cannot be charged with negligence where the clearance has been approved by the proper governmental authorities and is not manifestly dangerous to travelers making the usual use of the highway,[74]

provided there is a compliance with other related statutes specifying steps to be taken for the safety of the traveling public.[75] The failure to post a clearance sign does not necessarily establish negligence on the part of the railroad in the absence of a statutory requirement in this respect;[76] but there should be a compliance with a statute requiring such a sign,[77] and, while the violation of such a statutory direction may not be negligence per se,[78] it is an incident from which negligence may be legitimately inferred.[79]

Changed conditions. The railroad company may be liable for injuries resulting from failure to make changes required by an increased or new use of the crossing in the case of a bridge or trestle across a highway,[80] or of a bridge or viaduct carrying the highway over the railroad tracks.[81] The acquiescence of a municipality in the maintenance by a railroad company of a railroad bridge over one of its streets does not give the railroad company the right perpetually to maintain the bridge as originally constructed.[82] However, a railroad owes no duty at common law to relocate the abutment walls of an underpass merely because the public has made an increased and new use of the highway.[83]

Effect of duty imposed on, or assumed by, or under contract with, another than railroad company. While, where the duty of maintenance in respect of crossings at separate grades is imposed solely on the municipality, the railroad company is not liable for defects due to want of proper maintenance,[84] it is generally held that, when the railroad company has the duty of construction or maintenance in respect of crossings at separate grades, it is not relieved from liability for noncompliance with such duty by the fact that another has assumed to construct or to maintain,[85] or by the fact that the duty of construction or maintenance is imposed also on another.[86] The fact that the municipality has failed to comply with its duty as to the maintenance of guards or barriers on some part of the road other than that at a highway bridge over the railroad tracks does not affect the liability of the railroad company in respect of providing guards or barriers at such bridge or its approaches.[87]

In general, the liability of a railroad company to third persons, who have suffered injury as a direct and proximate result of its failure to perform its contract with a municipality to construct and maintain a bridge over its tracks within such municipality, depends on the terms of the particular contract as affected by any ordinance or statute in force within the municipality relating to the construction and maintenance of such bridge.[88] It has been held that where a railroad has constructed and maintained a bridge across its tracks under contract with a municipality, the liability of the railroad for injuries depends on whether the municipality would be liable if it had constructed and maintained the bridge and whether the railroad has assumed such liability which otherwise would be on the municipality.[89] Where by virtue of statute a state highway department has assumed the work of removing snow from a bridge and the railroad has been freed from all duties pertaining to snow removal, it cannot be held liable for negligence on the part of the highway department in the performance of the work.[90] The responsibility of a railroad for keeping a bridge safe and secure may arise by virtue of an agreement between it and a landowner.[91]

Approaches. The obligation of the railroad company sometimes extends not only to the bridge or structure over its right of way, but to the necessary and proper approaches thereto,[92] and, in such case, a railroad cannot relieve itself of such obligation by contract with a municipality, unless there is statutory authority therefor.[93] The approach to a bridge includes only the embankment, or other made or prepared structure, necessary to reach the bridge proper from the original level of the street.[94]

Pillars or piers in road A railroad is not necessarily negligent in constructing a railroad bridge or trestle over a highway with a pier located in the highway[95] or with a pillar located on the sidewalk;[96] nor is it necessarily guilty of negligence in maintaining such a supporting pier or post without lights.[97] However, a railroad maintaining supporting pillars in the street owes a duty of due care.[98] The "wagonway," as used in a statute permitting piers for the support of a railroad bridge running over a highway to be located at the outer edge of the wagonway, is that part of a street ordinarily used for the passage of vehicles within the curb lines.[99] Under provisions casting the maintenance of a highway on the commissioner of highways, a railroad company which constructs an overhead bridge with a center pier, which is approved by the highway commissioner, has been held not to have the duty of caring for a reflector placed on the pier to warn a traveler on the highway.[1]

§ 722. —— Obstruction of View or Hearing

The maintenance of necessary structures near a crossing which interfere with the view does not always impose liability on the railroad company for a resulting accident, but liability is sometimes imposed where the company negligently permits unnecessary obstructions, either of view or hearing.

It is not ordinarily regarded as negligence per se for a railroad company to have or permit at or near a railroad crossing structures or other obstructions reasonably necessary to the conduct of its business, although they interfere with the view,[2] as, for example, to allow cars or engines to remain on a sidetrack,[3] or to allow cars or engines to remain near or in the vicinity of crossings,[4] or to maintain telegraph poles on its right of way.[5] However, according to some cases, permitting cars to encroach on a highway, so as to obstruct the view of travelers, may be actionable negligence.[6] The existence of an obstruction to the view connected with the operation of the road may be considered in determining whether or not there was negligence on the part of the railroad company, under all the circumstances, either in permitting the obstruction or in operating the train which caused the accident.[7]

The duty of exercising a degree of care in approaching the crossing commensurate with the increased danger is imposed on the railroad company by the existence of obstructions which are connected with the operation of the road,[8] or which the railroad company has authorized a third person to maintain;[9] but it has been asserted that an obstruction of view which may tend to increase the hazards and make a crossing more dangerous does not require the railroad to do more than exercise ordinary care, that is, ordinary care commensurate with the circumstances.[10] While railroads are not obliged to accommodate the speed of their trains to smoke that lingers for brief intervals over railroad crossings,[11] a railroad which allows smoke and steam to obstruct the view of a highway across which a train is standing may be found negligent.[12]

Unnecessary obstructions. According to some cases, it is actionable negligence on the part of a railroad company to permit unnecessary obstructions on its right of way at or near a railroad crossing so as to obstruct the view thereat either of its servants approaching on a train or of persons on the highway,[13] as where it allows the right of way to become overgrown with trees, bushes, weeds, grass, etc., so as to obstruct such view.[14] However, in other cases the view is taken that the mere maintenance of an unnecessary obstruction to the view of persons approaching the crossing does not in itself constitute actionable negligence[15] in the absence of a statute requiring railroad companies to keep their rights of way free from such obstructions.[16] Under some statutes a railroad is required to clear its right of way of trees and shrubs for a specified distance on either side of a crossing,[17] and if it is derelict in performing such duty, and such dereliction is the proximate cause of injury, the railroad company is liable.[18] Violation of a statute requiring railroads to keep their rights of way clear of brush or trees for a specified distance does not give rise to a cause of action unless the interest invaded is one which the enactment was intended to protect;[19] and such interest, it has been held, is that of the travelers on an intersecting highway.[20]

While it has been held that the mere fact that there exist trees, brush, weeds, and the like which might obstruct a traveler's view of an approaching train is not of itself enough to charge the railroad company with the duty of adopting extraordinary safeguards at the crossing,[21] the view generally taken is that the railroad company must operate its trains with reference to unnecessary obstructions,[22] and, if necessary to protect the traveler, must use precautions in addition to those ordinarily used;[23] and, in any event, the maintenance of such obstruction may be considered with other circumstances in determining whether the company exercised due care.[24]

Obstructions not on right of way. A railroad company is not chargeable with negligence in respect of obstructions of view not on the right of way and not under its control,[25] as, for example, trees and shrubs, weeds, and the like.[26] According to some cases the duty of the operators of a train to use ordinary care to avoid injuring persons about to use a railroad crossing requires such operators to take into consideration obstructions of view off the right of way which render the crossing more dangerous than it otherwise would be,[27] but there is also authority to the contrary [28]

At other than public crossings. In general, the existence of obstructions on the railroad right of way at other than public crossings is not in itself actionable negligence,[29] at least as to persons who have no right to use the crossing,[30] or in the absence of contract or other obligation imposed on the railroad in connection with the creating of such a crossing [31] While there is authority for the view that the presence of obstructions to the view on the railroad right of way at a private crossing does not affect the duty of the railroad company,[32] there is also authority to the effect that such obstructions may be considered in determining the negligence of the railroad company in operating the train which caused the accident.[33]

Obstruction of hearing. If through the fault of the railroad company a traveler is prevented from hearing an approaching train, and the servants of the company fail to warn him of its approach, and induced by this failure of duty, which has lulled him into security, he attempts to cross the track and is injured, having used his faculties as best he could under the circumstances to ascertain if there is any danger ahead, negligence will be imputed to the company.[34] The fact that, because of noises

made by trains, a traveler is prevented from hearing signals on another train which is approaching the crossing may be considered in determining whether there was negligence in operating such other train.[35] However, the engineer of a train has a right to assume that no person will risk his life by entering on a railroad track in the dark where he is unable to hear because of noise,[36] and the fact that engines are permitted to stand near a crossing under steam pressure, and that some noise is made by the escape of steam through automatic valves in the ordinary way, has been held not of itself to constitute actionable negligence although the noise prevents a traveler from hearing an approaching train.[37]

§ 723. —— Knowledge of, or Notice to, Railroad Company

Ordinarily a railroad company is not liable for injuries resulting from a claimed defect or obstruction at a crossing unless it had, or in the exercise of due care should have had, notice thereof, but under some statutes liability may arise without notice.

In order to charge a railroad company with negligence for defects or obstructions at a crossing which it is bound to keep in proper condition and repair, it must appear that the railroad company had notice of the defect or obstruction,[38] or should, under the circumstances, have had notice thereof,[39] especially where the defect or obstruction is caused by a third person;[40] and it must also appear that the company failed within a reasonable time thereafter to repair or remove it.[41] The railroad company is, however, chargeable with knowledge of defects or obstructions which by the exercise of due care it could discover,[42] and may be liable for a defective condition which has been allowed to remain for an unreasonable time after notice or after such time as would imply notice;[43] and it may, therefore, be liable in respect of such defects or obstructions even in the absence of actual knowledge.[44]

Under some statutes the railroad is under a duty to keep its crossings and approaches in good and sufficient repair with or without notice.[45] Thus, according to some cases, a statute imposing the duty on a railroad company to keep its crossings in repair requires such companies to take notice of the condition of the crossing and at all times to be informed as to any defects therein.[46] However, in respect of injuries at crossings to which a statute does not apply, the railroad company is not liable if it did not have knowledge of the defect, and could not have known of it in the exercise of ordinary care.[47]

Sufficiency of original construction. If an accident was caused by an originally defective or improper construction, the company will not be heard to say that it did not know of the unreasonably unsafe condition,[48] but, in the case of a failure to remedy an unsafe condition arising after a proper and safe construction, the railroad is not liable unless through its proper agents it knew of the defective condition or by the exercise of ordinary care should have known of it.[49]

Statutory notice of defect or obstruction as condition precedent to liability. Where, by statutory provisions, a notice to the railroad company by a public officer is a condition precedent to its duty to repair or to remove a defect,[50] or to the liability expressly imposed by statute for failure to remove an obstruction on its right of way,[51] liability does not arise in the absence of such notice. However, the notice of a defective condition, required under a statute permitting the county to recover the cost of construction if the railroad fails to maintain a crossing in good order after notice from the board of supervisors of the county, has been held to relate only to the right of the board to sue thereunder, and not to that of private individuals for whose benefit the crossing must at all times be maintained.[52] Where a statute imposes the duty on the railroad company to repair farm crossings regardless of the written notice by the landowner, which is provided for in order to permit the landowner to repair and to recover the expense thereof and a penalty, the railroad company may be liable for an injury resulting from the defective condition of such a crossing even in the absence of such notice.[53]

§ 724. —— Status of, and Care Required as to, Persons Passing around, over, between, or under Trains or Cars

a. Passing around

b. Passing over, between, or under

a. Passing Around

The railroad company may be liable where a train obstructs a crossing for an unreasonable or unlawful period of time and fails to exercise due care as to one who attempts to pass around it; but where such a person crosses outside the limits of the highway and is regarded as a trespasser, the company is not liable in the absence of willful or wanton conduct.

According to some cases, a person who leaves the highway and, on the land of the railroad, attempts to pass around a train or cars obstructing a crossing is not a trespasser,[54] at least where the crossing has been obstructed for an unreasonable or unlawful period.[55] The railroad company is under the duty of exercising due care to avoid injury to such person,[56] and for a violation of such duty it may become liable.[57] So the view has been taken that, where the railroad company has blocked a crossing for an excessive time by its train or cars, it is liable for an injury sustained by a person who, while exercising due care, attempts to go around the train or cars[58] on the land of the railroad company[59] or on the property of an adjacent landowner.[60] There is, however, authority for the view that the railroad company may not be regarded as negligent where the injured person attempts to cross at a point where there is only a small opening between trains and such point is not a customary place to cross.[61]

Even though the obstruction is a lawful one, according to some cases a traveler is not obliged to wait until the train is removed, and if he is obliged to cross at points other than within the line of the street on account of such obstruction, the railroad company should use ordinary care and diligence to prevent injury to him.[62] According to other cases, however, even though the crossing has been blocked for an unreasonable time, a person who attempts to cross outside the limits of the highway is a trespasser,[63] and where a person is regarded as a trespasser, the railroad company is not liable in the absence of willful, reckless, or wanton conduct on its part.[64] In any event, if the employees of a railroad company in charge of the train are aware of the presence of a person who is passing around the train, they are under the duty of using reasonable care to avoid injuring such person.[65]

b. Passing Over, Between, or Under

A railroad company may be liable to one who suffers injury as a result of its failure to exercise reasonable care towards one who attempts to pass over, between, or under standing cars which obstruct a crossing; but where such a person is regarded as a trespasser, the only duties of the company are to use due care after discovering him in a dangerous position, and not to injure him willfully or wantonly.

According to some cases, if a train or car has obstructed the crossing only for a reasonable time, a person who attempts to pass through, under or over the train or a car is regarded as a trespasser,[66] and the only duties which the railroad company owes are to use due care after it has discovered that such person is in a dangerous position,[67] and not to injure him willfully or wantonly.[68] In some decisions the view has been expressed, apparently without regard to the unlawfulness or unreasonableness of the blocking that a person who attempts to cross through, under, or over an obstructing train or car is a trespasser,[69] and that the railroad company is not responsible for failing to look out for such a traveler or for failing to give him warning, before moving the train or cars, in the absence of knowledge on the part of the trainmen of an attempt so to cross by the injured person or other persons, or of the trainmen's having reason to anticipate the presence of a person or persons thereon who might be injured by the movement of the train,[70] but, according to other authorities, where the train has obstructed the crossing for an unreasonable or unlawful period, a person who attempts to cross through, under, or over the train or a car is not a trespasser,[71] and the railroad company is under the duty to use reasonable or ordinary care to protect such persons[72] and to give proper warnings before moving the train or cars.[73]

According to some decisions, a person who, because of an obstruction, attempts to cross at a distance from the crossing is a trespasser,[74] and the railroad company is liable only for wanton or willful injury,[75] and not for a failure to give warning before moving the train where its trainmen had no notice of the presence of the injured person.[76] It has been held, however, that the mere fact that a person attempted to cross between the cars a short distance from, but as near as possible to, the highway, did not make such person a trespasser;[77] and where a crossing was blocked in violation of a statute and no warning was given before the train was moved, it has been held that the railroad company was liable for an injury sustained by one who crossed under a car at some distance from the crossing.[78]

In general, if trainmen saw and knew that people were crossing at the time of moving, and were in danger of being hurt,[79] or otherwise had reason to anticipate the presence of persons who might be injured by the movements of the train,[80] as where persons, with the knowledge of the company, have been in the habit of crossing trains or cars at that place,[81] they are bound to use due care to protect from injury persons so crossing, and the railroad company may be liable for injuries sustained as a result of the violation of such duty. One who crosses over between the engine and a car at the invitation of the engineer in charge of the movement of the train is not a trespasser;[82] and, in such case, the engineer is bound to exercise reasonable care to avoid doing any act to injure the pedestrian.[83]

At places other than public crossings. The railroad company has been held not to owe the duty to give warning where the crossing is merely a permissive one;[84] but the view has also been taken that, where a way across the track is constantly used by the public with the knowledge of the employees of the company without objection, the duty of exercising reasonable care toward one crossing over or between cars exists.[85]

§ 725. Safeguards at Crossings

a. In general
b. Warning as to presence of obstruction

a. In General

It is the duty of a railroad company to exercise ordinary care at a crossing by adopting a reasonably safe and effective mode, commensurate with the danger at the particular crossing, of warning travelers of the approach of trains, and what constitutes reasonable and timely warning depends on the circumstances and surroundings, taking into consideration the amount and character of travel over the crossing, the extent of train movements, the operation, control, and speed of trains, and the character of the highway.

Although the track of a railroad is of itself a warning of danger to a person approaching it,[86] it is the duty of the railroad company to exercise ordinary care at a crossing[87] by adopting a reasonably safe and effective mode, commensurate with the danger at the particular crossing, of warning travelers of the approach of trains,[88] especially

Traveler exercising due care

Whether railroad was negligent in failing to take adequate precautions to warn motorists of a grade crossing depended on whether the admonitory signals provided were sufficient to warn a traveler exercising due care for his own protection.—Johnson v. Maine Cent. R. Co., 38 A.2d 884, 141 Me. 38

Continuance

Fact that railroad has voluntarily assumed to maintain particular safeguard at crossing or has customarily performed particular act of warning, so that public has become acquainted with safeguard or the practice, raises question of duty of railroad to continue the safeguard or practice, or to give adequate notice of its discontinuance, and discontinuance may be considered in determining negli-

where the extraordinary character of the crossing is caused by the railroad company itself.[89] Moreover, when a railroad company has created at a crossing a place of extra danger, it is bound to use extra precautions,[90] but it has also been held that this rule applies only when the situation has been created by some act of the company.[91] The duty to give reasonable and timely warning of the approach of trains to crossings has been held to exist under the common law independently of any statutory requirement,[92] and, where a statute relating to safeguards at crossings is inapplicable to a particular crossing, the railroad may or should provide at such crossing such warning as is required by the common law.[93]

A railroad has no duty to give warning in any particular manner of the approach of its train to a crossing, but its duty is fulfilled if it gives such warning by any reasonably adequate means.[94] What constitutes reasonable and timely warning depends on the circumstances and surroundings.[95] The protection the railroad company should give at a crossing may depend on the special features and facts connected with it,[96] such as the amount and character of travel, the extent of train movements, the operation, control, and speed of trains, and the character of the highway.[97] Thus the protection rendered at a crossing in a populous city

Sufficiency of wigwag or flash signal

(1) Providing and maintaining in working condition electrically illuminated flash signal at customary distance from grade crossing almost eight feet above level of highway, to warn travelers of trains' approach to crossing, was a sufficient compliance with common-law rule requiring railroad to give reasonable and timely warning of approach of train, although approaching motorist's view of signal might be obstructed by intervening traffic—Fryrear v. Kentucky & Indiana Terminal R Co, 220 S.W 2d 546, 310 Ky. 250, followed in 220 S.W.2d 551, 310 Ky. 258, Musick's Adm'r v. Kentucky & Indiana Terminal R. Nighttime travel

Knowledge of increased traffic

(1) Fact that traffic of one of main trunk highways of state had been diverted for three weeks over country highway ordinarily carrying light traffic was sufficient to justify inference that railroad had knowledge of increase of traffic over crossing, with respect to duty of providing for special protection at crossing.—Carbone v. Boston & Maine R. R., 192 A. 858, 89 N H. 12.

(2) Knowledge of fireman and brakeman of train crew as to increased highway traffic was knowledge of railroad, with respect to duty should be greater than at ordinary crossings in the country,[98] and at private crossings little protection may be necessary;[99] but the circumstance, without more, that a crossing is greatly frequented by travelers is insufficient as a basis on which to predicate negligence of the railroad from failure to maintain safety devices there,[1] and an increase in vehicular traffic over a highway does not necessarily compel an increase in the warning devices maintained at a railroad crossing on the highway.[2] Other circumstances to be considered may be such as the inability of travelers upon the highway to see or hear the train until a collision is unavoidable,[3] the absence of a light at the crossing after dark,[4] or the use of the crossing by a large number of school children.[5]

The test is the peculiar danger of the crossing even though it be in a small village[6] or in the country,[7] and the general character of the crossing is to be considered rather than its character at the time of the accident.[8] So the mere fact that a railroad crossing is in the country does not necessarily, in all circumstances, relieve the railroad of any duty to maintain special safeguards.[9] In considering the need of safeguards at a crossing, those provided at other crossings are not to be considered.[10]

It has been held that the common law does not require the provision of special safeguards or warning facilities at a railroad crossing[11] unless such precautions are reasonably necessary to the protection of travelers,[12] but the absence of such safeguards affects the diligence to be required in the operation of the trains over such crossing.[13] On the other hand, special safeguards have been held necessary at unusually dangerous crossings even in the absence of statutory requirement[14] or order of providing for special protection at railroad crossing—Carbone v Boston & Maine R R, supra.

Number of trains and people

The protection the railroad company should give at a crossing may depend on the number of trains and people using such crossing.

12. Mo—Dimond v. Terminal R Ass'n of St Louis, 141 S.W 2d 789, 346 Mo 333

It is not every crossing of highway, under common law, independently of statute or ordinance, at which railroad is required to have gate or flagman, or maintain signals and lights, but only those crossings at which precautions of such character are reasonably necessary to the protection of travelers, and the duty arises only when demanded by ordinary prudence to protect travelers exercising ordinary care against dangers resulting from prudent and usual operation of trains—Eggleston v. Louisiana & A. Ry. Co, La App, 192 So 774

Peculiar danger

Duty to provide signals or warnings at public highway crossing arises only when situation or surroundings of crossing render it peculiarly or more than ordinarily dangerous, or when particular place is so peculiarly dangerous that prudent persons cannot use public road in safety unless company employs extraordinary means to signal approach of trains.—Walker v Texas & N. O. R. Co, Tex Civ App, 150 S W 2d 853, error dismissed, judgment correct.

of a railroad commission,[15] and notwithstanding specific statutory regulations as to such crossings.[16] In determining whether a railroad is negligent for failure to take special precautions at a crossing, in the absence of a statute or order of the commission prescribing such precautions each case turns on its own facts,[17] and liability may be imposed on the railroad failing to take such precautions only where the location and surrounding conditions and the manner of running trains are such as to render the crossing unusually dangerous.[18] So the inquiry in such cases is concerned with the adequacy of the warning given by the railroad at the crossing, and not whether the traveler on the highway was aware of the warning, since the traveler must be deemed to have been aware of an adequate warning.[19]

If the means adopted are such as an ordinarily prudent person would adopt under similar circumstances, it is not required that the means shall prove effective.[20] Where the particular safeguards are not prescribed by law, the railroad company has the right of selection.[21] A railroad is not obliged to have its night warnings at crossings visible by day or its day warnings visible by night.[22] The object of signals and warnings at a railroad crossing is to impart notice to a person endangered of the approach of a train,[23] and, where such person is shown to possess such notice, the failure of the railroad to provide a signal or other warning will not support a charge of negligence based on such failure.[24]

Barriers. A duty to erect barriers at a crossing arises only where the embankment is not otherwise reasonably safe for travelers,[25] and a railroad company is not negligent in not constructing barriers at a crossing reasonably safe without barriers although the roadway crossing the track is not as wide as required by statute.[26]

To whom applicable. The rules regarding safeguards at crossings apply to all types of railroads, as, for example, a logging railroad,[27] whether the crossing be over the main track,[28] a spur track,[29] a passing track,[30] or an industrial track.[31] The above rules are not changed by the fact that the

Generally, where a railroad is making a reasonable and legitimate use of a crossing, the presence of a train on the crossing is sufficient warning to persons using the highway, and special safeguards need not be employed where there is no statute in effect requiring additional signals or warnings; but additional warnings may be necessary where special conditions create an unusual hazard.

The view generally taken is that under ordinary conditions, where the railroad is making a reasonable and legitimate use of a crossing, the presence of a train or cars at the crossing is sufficient notice or warning of obstruction and of danger,[34] and the railroad company is not bound to give any further warning as to the presence of such obstruction[35] or to employ special safeguards where there

Greater duty than to observe approaching train

The duty of a driver to see a train which is approaching a crossing but not in the intersection is not as great as it is to see a train which is on the crossing all the time while he travels an ample distance to see and stop—Earle v Salt Lake & Utah R Corp, 165 P. 2d 877, 109 Utah 111.

Warning as to location of crossing

Where railroad has used due care to warn traveling public of location of crossing, train or other obstruction on crossing is in itself notice of danger without any additional warning, but where there has been a negligent failure to warn of location of crossing, presence of train across intersection may not be sufficient warning of danger.—Southern Pac Co v. Train as best warning

Presence of train on public crossing is best evidence and warning to drivers of automobiles approaching crossing on highway.—Chicago, M, St. P & P R Co. v. Slowik, C A Minn, 184 F 2d 920

Moving or stationary train

Ordinarily presence of a train or railway cars on a crossing, whether moving or stationary, is sufficient notice to a driver of a vehicle on highway of such obstruction, and in absence of unusual circumstances, operating railway company is not under any duty to provide any other notice or warning.

is no statute in effect requiring additional precautionary measures.[36] Such rule has been followed on the theory that the purpose of warnings and signals at crossings is to give notice of approaching trains and not of trains already occupying the crossing,[37] but it has also been held that the purpose of statutes dealing with the safe construction and maintenance of railroad crossings and the maintenance of appropriate safety devices is the general protection of the public at railroad crossings, not only as to trains approaching the crossing, but also as to trains obstructing the crossing,[38] and that, where the warnings required by the statute are customarily given, a traveler on a highway has a right to rely on them as to passing as well as approaching trains.[39]

The general rule that no special warning need be given, or safeguard taken, in the case of a train obstructing a crossing, applies where the crossing is not a particularly dangerous one,[40] and physical conditions afford no reason for anticipating injury to travelers in the exercise of due care.[41] Even when it is dark the mere failure to give warning

Automatic signals see infra § 727

Common experience dictates that an object as large as a freight car is, of itself, sufficient notice of its presence to warn any person using the highway with ordinary care, and in the absence of a special statute, a railroad company ordinarily will not be found negligent because it failed to station guards or light the car, or otherwise give warning of its presence in the highway—Cella v Pennsylvania R Co., 70 A 2d 638, 364 Pa 82

Knowledge of other collisions

Railroad's knowledge that other collisions had occurred between automobiles and trains occupying crossing did not of itself obligate railroad to maintain additional safeguards, since railroad need not provide greater warning to negligent than to careful drivers—McParlan v Grand Trunk Western R. Where railroad crossed highway at almost a right angle and highway approach was straight for at least a hundred yards, ordinary prudence did not require that railroad place signals observable by users of highway, notwithstanding alleged frequency of accidents at such crossing—Fleming v. of such obstruction is not necessarily an act of negligence,[42] in the absence of special circumstances which make the crossing peculiarly hazardous,[43] notwithstanding, according to some cases, the obstruction is unreasonably prolonged;[44] and the railroad company is not chargeable with negligence for failure to give a warning where conditions are not such that the employees in charge of the train, in the exercise of reasonable care, should anticipate that because of the darkness persons traveling along the highway in vehicles properly equipped with lights and operated with due care would be likely to come into collision with the obstruction.[45] There is no duty on the part of the railroad company to anticipate that one using the highway will not see the train and be apprised of its presence as fully as he would be if other signs or warnings were used.[46]

On the other hand, the train itself is not always an effective and adequate warning of the obstruction of the crossing, and hence the duty of the railroad company is not necessarily discharged under all circumstances if it fails to give additional warning in some form.[47] A peculiar or unusual hazard, condition, or practice may impose a duty on the railroad to give some special warning of the presence of a train on the crossing,[48] particularly where a car obstructs the crossing in the darkness,[49] but the railroad must have, or be charged with, notice of the factors which make necessary the additional warning of the presence of cars upon the crossing [50] Whether or not a warning is required in any given case depends on the particular surrounding circumstances.[51] The test is applied whether an ordinarily prudent person would have deemed it necessary to maintain additional warning devices to prevent users of the highway from running into the train on the crossing,[52] and the railroad company is guilty of negligence where it fails to give such notice of the presence of the train as a reasonably prudent man would be expected to give under the circumstances [53]

In general, a crossing is extrahazardous or dangerous so as to require a warning or notice of the obstruction if the railroad company through its operative employees can, under the existing conditions, reasonably anticipate that a person traveling on the highway in a vehicle having standard lights and exercising due care would nevertheless be likely to be injured by reason of the train blocking the highway.[54] The train is not itself a sufficient warning where the combination of circumstances presents a situation in the nature of a trap or one which would naturally deceive a traveler on the highway [55] So a railroad may be required to provide watchmen, gongs, lights, or similar warning devices where a crossing is more than ordinarily dangerous because of obstructions interfering with visibility.[56] According to some decisions, a railroad crossing, not in itself inherently dangerous, may become so by virtue of unusual atmospheric conditions, such as heavy snow or fog, in which case it is the duty of the railroad to anticipate the

Factors to be considered

(1) In stopping a train on a highway crossing, railroad must take into consideration atmospheric conditions, nature and extent of darkness, ability and likelihood of travelers to become aware of the obstruction, nature and extent of use of highway by the public, length of time highway is to be obstructed, infrequency of passage of trains over highway, necessity for the stopping, and other factors according to the existing situation.—Hendrickson v. Union Pac R Co, 136 P.2d 438, 17 Wash.2d 548, 161 A L R 96.

(2) Whether warning is required depends on circumstances, such as atmospheric conditions, obscurity and darkness of crossing, length of time crossing is obstructed, and topography of land including highway and crossing.—Hicks v. Chicago, M., St P & P R. Co., Mo.App., 233 S W 2d 787

(3) Court may consider that a dark railroad car will absorb a considerable proportion of light rays which strike it and that a large proportion of rays which are actually reflected will travel in various directions so that only a relatively small proportion of rays will register on eyes of motorist—Broberg v Northern Pac Ry Co., 182 P.2d 851, 120 Mont. 280.

(4) Court may consider that physical construction of crossing was such that lights of an approaching automobile would shine under, instead of upon, side of car obstructing the crossing.—Broberg v. Northern Pac Ry. Co., supra.

Street light

The presence of a municipally maintained street light approximately one hundred feet from intersection between highway and railroad tracks did not, by reason of effect of street light on vision of an approaching motorist, create such an unusual, peculiar and deceptive condition as to impose on railroad or its employees a duty to warn one driving an automobile, at a reasonable rate of speed in compliance with law, of presence of railroad cars across intersection—Holt v. Thompson, C C A Okl, 115 F 2d 1013.

Reasonable assumption

Duty of furnishing additional signals, gates or warnings of the presence of trains across highways arises only when the operatives of the train could reasonably have assumed that, due to peculiar conditions, the lawful presence of the trains across highways was not sufficient to warn travelers approaching the crossing in a careful manner.—Texas & N. Incline coupled with other circumstances

(1) Where, because of downgrade of highway leading toward crossing, lights on motor vehicles were focused only on roadway until in immediate vicinity of crossing, and where, because of overhanging tree limbs, signal light was obstructed from view, railroad was under duty to provide special warnings or safeguards—Callaway v. Adams, 40 So. 2d 73, 252 Ala 136

(2) Where much traveled street inclined down as it approached crossing so that beam of automobile's headlights tilted so as not to strike flat car across street, and fog impaired visibility, an unusual hazard existed, imposing duty on railroad, in exercise of ordinary care, to provide warning to travelers approaching crossing—Carson v. Thompson, Mo App, 161 S W 2d 995.

(3) Where highway approached railroad crossing on a curve, and dipped, railroad was bound to have knowledge of existence of curve and dip in highway and that automobile lights would be deflected either sideways or up and down so that highway and tracks were not plainly visible at all times to motorists and was required to take reasonable precautions accordingly—Doty v Southern Pac Co, 129 P 2d 991, 59 Ariz 449.

Prior railroad crossing collisions on dark rainy nights when crossing was blocked by cars required that railroad make some effort to determine cause of such collisions.—Texas & N. O. R Co. v Davis, Tex.Civ. App, 210 S W.2d 195, refused no reversible error.

added peril to travelers and give affirmative warning of the presence of its trains upon the crossing,[57] but according to other decisions additional warnings are not required merely because of the existence of unusual atmospheric conditions, such as fog or snow.[58]

Where it has been customary to give reasonable and timely warning that a train is standing on, or running over, a crossing, and a traveler upon the road relies on receiving such warning, the failure to give the warning is negligence.[59] If the railroad has in effect given notice to the public that the railroad will warn them of trains at a crossing, it is bound to assume that every member of the public will receive and rely on such notice,[60] and knowledge or lack of knowledge of plaintiff unknown to the railroad concerning such custom of giving warning or of the discontinuance of such warning cannot affect the nature or extent of the duty owed to plaintiff by the railroad or the performance of such duty.[61]

§ 726. —— Signboards

A railroad company may be required to maintain signboards or warning posts at its crossings over highways to warn travelers of the existence of the railway, and the violation of a statute imposing such a requirement, while not creating an absolute liability on the part of the railroad company, may, under the circumstances, constitute such negligence as to make it liable for a resulting injury.

Under the provisions of some statutes, it is required that a railroad company maintain signboards or warning posts at its crossings over highways to warn travelers of the existence of the railway.[62] Such a statute, in accordance with its terms, may[63] or may not[64] be applicable within the limits of a municipality, and, while it may be construed to extend to a crossing of only part of the width of a street,[65] its application may be restricted to crossings of a "public highway" and not extend to the crossing of a road which is entirely within the lines of the railroad's right of way.[66] Where the state road department has placed its own warning signs at a crossing, the railroad company has been held not to be required by the statute to place additional signs at such crossing.[67]

The violation of such a statute, while not creating an absolute liability on the part of the railroad company, may, under the circumstances, constitute such negligence as to make the railroad company liable for a resulting injury.[68] On the other hand, compliance with such a statute does not necessarily negative any negligence on the part of the railroad with respect to safeguards at crossings.[69] Even in the absence of statutory requirement, it may be negligence not to provide such a signboard if the crossing is of an unusually dangerous character,[70] but it has also been held that the common law does not require a railroad to maintain such warning devices as signboards at highway crossings in the country[71] and that a railroad has no duty to place on the highway adjacent to or near the crossing any warning sign of a metal substance which will reflect the lights of an approaching automobile and warn the motorist of the crossing[72]

Minimum care

Statute requiring railroad to erect suitable crossing signs prescribes

Where the character of the sign is prescribed by statute, compliance must be had therewith[73] Where the form of sign is not prescribed, however, no particular character of sign is necessary, but the sign need be only such as will give reasonable notice to persons approaching the crossing[74] The use of letters smaller than required by statute may constitute negligence,[75] although it has been held, under a statute requiring the highway authorities to put up signboards at crossings and requiring the railroad company to give signals at all crossings so designated, that a signboard is sufficient if it is in plain view of passing trains, although there is no lettering on the side toward the railroad,[76] and some of the letters are obliterated,[77] and the signboard does not extend wholly across the highway[78] An inconsiderable mistake in the distance the sign is placed from the track is of no consequence.[79]

Ordinarily crossing signs should be located at points at which they are most easily visible[80] At some crossings such signs have been held an adequate safeguard if placed on either side of the highway or railroad crossing.[81] However, it may be required under the statute that signs be provided on both sides of the track,[82] and it has been held that a railroad maintaining only a single warning sign on one side of the highway or crossing failed to comply with the statute requiring warning signs at crossings.[83] It has also been held that even where the statute requires only that "a sign" be placed at the crossing, the placing of a single sign visible from only one approach to the crossing may constitute negligence since the statute must be deemed a minimum requirement with respect to number of signs, and be deemed to require that signs be placed where they can be easily seen by travelers[84]

Since the object of such a signboard is to warn travelers of the existence of the railroad crossing, and of the approach of trains,[85] the absence thereof does not make the company liable to a person

(2) The purpose of warning signs at railroad crossings is to warn persons using highways of danger of approaching trains, not to prevent familiar with the crossing and knowing of the existence of the railroad at the time of the accident[86] or to one who struck the train because of inattention.[87] Thus the fact that a train stopped on the crossing hid the warning sign from an automobilist's view has been held immaterial in an action for a crossing collision, since the train itself was notice of its presence.[88] Where, in the absence of other negligence, a railroad lacked knowledge of the fact that a sign erected by it had been knocked down a short time before the accident complained of, it may not be held liable for failure to reerect and have the sign in place at the time of the accident.[89]

Closing of old highway. A railroad is not liable for failure to erect warning signs advising travelers of the closing of an old highway and the diversion of traffic to a new one where the railroad had no right, and was under no duty, to erect such signs[90]

§ 727. —— Automatic Signals

a. In general
b. Maintenance and operation

a. In General

The maintenance by railroad companies of automatic signals at crossings may be required under the terms of some statutes, but a railroad company ordinarily is not negligent in failing to maintain an automatic alarm, in the absence of statutory requirement, unless the crossing is more than ordinarily hazardous

Under the terms of some statutes or governmental regulations, railroad companies are obliged to maintain automatic signals at crossings,[91] and the violation of such statutes my constitute negligence per se, as discussed infra § 730 However, a railroad company ordinarily is not negligent in failing to maintain an automatic alarm, in the absence of statutory requirement,[92] when the crossing is not more than ordinarily hazardous,[93] as where the view at the crossing is unobstructed[94] In other words, mechanical warnings ordinarily are required only at crossings so dangerous that prudent persons cannot use them with safety unless extraordinary protective means are used.[95] Since the purpose of a signaling device is to warn of approaching trains rather than the presence of a train on the crossing, a railroad ordinarily is not negligent in failing to have a crossing properly equipped with a mechanical signal where an automobile is driven into a train already occupying the crossing.[96]

On the other hand, the absence of a statute or order of a commission requiring automatic signals does not relieve the company altogether from negligence in failure to maintain such safeguards,[97] even, under some circumstances, where the train is occupying the crossing at the time of the accident,[98] and the fact that a railroad crossing is frequently used by travelers is not an indispensable factor to a determination that the crossing is particularly dangerous so as to require the maintenance of an automatic signaling device, since the hazardous nature of the crossing may depend on the physical nature of the crossing.[99] Accordingly, if a railroad crossing in the country is peculiarly dangerous to travelers because of its location, or its mode of construction, or because the track is curved or the view is obstructed, the railroad must exercise ordinary care to meet the peril with a special warning signal.[1] The purpose of an automatic warning signal is to warn persons on or approaching the crossing of a coming train and it does not notify the operator of such a train of the presence of a person or vehicle on the crossing and is not designed for that purpose.[2]

b. Maintenance and Operation

If signals are provided, the public has the right to rely thereon, and the railroad company must use reasonable care to keep them in good condition and in working order or to give notice that they are not in good working order. The failure of automatic signals to operate at the time of the accident ordinarily is evidence of negligence, but under certain circumstances the railroad company may not be liable in the event of failure of the signal to function.

If signals are provided, although not required by statute, the public has the right to rely thereon,[3] and the company must use reasonable care to keep them in good condition and in working order,[4] or to give notice that they are not operating,[5] since if

Collision with stationary cars

Railroad which maintains automatic wigwag signal system at crossing will be held liable for injuries motorist sustains in collision with stationary cars as result of defect in system, regardless of whether system was designed to warn travelers of approach of trains rather than of danger from stationary cars.—Mallett v. Southern Pac. Co., 68 P.2d 281, 20 Cal.App.2d 500.

Other warning

In action for injuries to passengers in automobile colliding with defendant's train on railroad crossing, whether wigwag signal at crossing was defective or defendant was negligent in maintenance thereof was immaterial, in view of evidence of defendant's negligence in failing to give any warning of presence of train on crossing, as by sounding locomotive whistle or bell, after discovering that wigwag was not operating.—Peri v. Los Angeles Junction Ry., 137 P.2d 441, 22 Cal.2d 111.

such a signal is misunderstood it is a menace [6] The failure to repair a gong has been held to be only a circumstance showing negligence and is not negligence per se.[7] Although a bell cannot be classed with a gate or flagman,[8] a statute requiring an efficient electric bell requires an automatic one and does not comprehend one operated by the hand of a trainman.[9]

The failure of automatic bells or warning lights, placed at a railroad crossing to signal approaching trains, to ring or flash at the time of the accident is evidence of negligence,[10] unless the person injured knew that such a signal was no longer used,[11] or that it was defective,[12] although in the determination of the negligence of the company it is immaterial whether the injured person knew of the existence of the signal.[13] The company has been held negligent in operating a fast train over a crossing where an automatic bell is not functioning.[14] Where a bell is provided for each of two tracks which cross, the failure of one to ring, although the other rings, is negligence, where such fact is known to the company [15] An automatic signal may be sufficient notwithstanding it is operated only by a train upon the main track,[16] but not where the signal functions erratically,[17] as where it operates from causes other than an approaching train[18] and rings most of the time [19]

Under certain circumstances the railroad company may not be liable in the event of failure of the signal to function,[20] as, for example, where the bell failed to ring momentarily[21] or where the flashlight signals temporarily failed to function.[22] It has been held that, in order to charge a railroad company with negligence in this matter, it must be shown that the railroad company had knowledge of the defective signal,[23] or constructive notice thereof,[24] as where the defective condition existed for such length of time that the company in the exercise of due care should have discovered it.[25] The failure of such a signal to function is not negligence where the injury is the result of a cause against which such signal was not a safeguard,[26] as where an automobile was driven into a standing train,[27] but it has also been held that, where a train standing or moving across the highway was not observed by a traveler through no fault of his own and the traveler was injured by relying on, and reasonably acting in compliance with, signals known by the railroad to be defective, the railroad is liable to the traveler.[28] The failure, through the railroad's negligence, of a warning signal at a crossing to operate does not constitute a breach of duty to a person attempting to cross the track on a street some distance from the signal.[29] It has been held that the installation of an automatic signal is a recognition of the dangerous character of the crossing,[30] but a contrary view has also been taken.[31]

§ 728. —— Gates and Flagmen

a. In general

b. Maintenance and operation

a. In General

A railroad company ordinarily is under no duty to maintain a flagman or gate at a crossing, and negligence cannot be predicated on a mere failure to do so except where the maintenance of such safeguards is required by statute, ordinance, order of a public service commission, or other proper authority, or where the crossing is so extraordinarily hazardous that ordinary care or reasonable prudence requires that a flagman or gates should be maintained.

Under some statutes or governmental regulations, a railroad company is required to provide flagmen or gates at certain crossings,[32] and failure to comply with such statutes is negligence per se, as discussed infra § 730. Where not so required by statute, ordinance, order of a public service commission, or other proper authority, a railroad company ordinarily is under no duty to maintain a flagman or gate at a crossing, and negligence cannot be predicated on a mere failure to do so,[33] although such failure may, together with other circumstanc-

Installation

In action by motorist who drove into north-bound gondola car, standing on unlighted town crossing at night, in reliance on belief that wigwag signal system, which had ceased operating, operated until trains had cleared crossing while in fact system operated for south-bound train until crossing was cleared, but ceased to operate for north-bound train when last car passed point thirty-one feet south of crossing, evidence held not to show that wigwag signal system was installed at crossing in accordance with approved rules of railroad commission so as to exempt railroad from negligence because of any defect in the system which might exist —Mallett v. Southern Pac. Co., supra

Synchronized signals

Railroad could not escape liability for death of driver of automobile and injuries sustained by occupants when automobile ran into side of moving freight train at night while crossing signals with swinging red lights and bells were not operating because storage batteries had been permitted to run down, because of the fact that stop and go signal, which showed green at intersection a short distance from crossing at time of accident, was maintained by state, where signal was synchronized with railroad crossing signals—Langston v. Ordinance requiring flagman at crossing was construed as applicable to any railroad company operating line therein described—Illinois Cent. R. Co. v. McGuire's Adm'r, 38 S.W.2d 913, 239 Ky. 1.

Crossings to which applicable

Motorbus substituted for rail streetcar in urban transportation could not be considered a "streetcar" within city ordinance requiring railroad to have a flagman stationed at least two minutes before arrival of train at each crossing in city at which railroad crosses streets on which streetcars are running—Levy v. New Orleans & N. E. R. Co., La.App., 20 So.2d 559, rehearing denied 21 So.2d 155

Propelling power of cars

Ordinance requiring watchman at railroad crossing when street is being crossed by railway cars "propelled in whole or in part by steam" was not applicable to cars propelled on track by gasoline or electricity, precluding recovery in action arising out of collision at crossing with railroad car propelled by gasoline, where sole negligence of railroad was the alleged violation of the ordinance—Abernathy v. es, be considered as evidence of negligence in operating the road.[34] So it has been stated that whether a railroad is negligent in failing to maintain gates or a flagman at a crossing depends on the facts and circumstances of the particular case.[35] Failure to provide such safeguards may constitute negligence where, and only where, the conditions at the crossing are such that ordinary care or reasonable prudence requires that a flagman or gates should be maintained;[36] and this duty may exist independently of a statute regulating the signs and signals at crossings if the situation of the crossing reasonably requires it.[37]

Before a jury will be warranted in saying, in the absence of any statutory direction to that effect, that a railroad company should keep a flagman or gates at a crossing, it must be first shown that such crossing is more than ordinarily hazardous,[38] as,

Railroad rule

In action for death when truck in which decedent was riding was struck by defendant's work train at grade crossing which had been obstructed by freight train engaged in switching operations, a railroad rule requiring stationing of a flagman when freight trains or engines are standing was not inadmissible on ground that rule did not apply because in railroad parlance a "standing" train is one completely coupled, where rule was broad enough to include a separation of train into sections.—Pennsylvania R Co v. State 53 A 2d 562, 188 Md 646.

Question of fact

Whether failure of railroad company to station a flagman at a crossing constitutes omission of such care as ordinarily prudent person would use under same or similar circumstances is a question of fact, where there are obstructions which materially hinder view of approaching trains, provided crossing is used frequently by the public and numerous trains are run thereon.—Hawkins v Missouri Pac. Reasonable necessity

A railroad company is not required to have gate or flagman, or brakeman at every highway crossing, but only where reasonably necessary for protection of travelers, depending on amount of travel on highway, frequency of trains, view of trains approaching or moving over crossing, and other conditions.—Dimond v. Terminal R. Ass'n of St Louis, 141 S W 2d 789, 346 Mo 333

Special dangers

(1) Duty to provide special protection at crossings, such as crossing-tenders and gates, depends on special dangers inherent in situation and on volume of traffic on highway and railroad.—Dahar v Boston & M R R., 66 A 2d 707, 95 N H. 464.—Gillingham v Boston & M. R. R., 21 A 2d 174, 91 N.H. 433.

A railroad crossing is more than ordinarily dangerous if it is so peculiarly dangerous that prudent per-for instance, that it is in a thickly populated town or city,[39] that the view of the track is obstructed either by the company itself,[40] or by other objects proper in themselves,[41] or by the configuration of the land,[42] or that the crossing is one which, for any reason, a reasonably prudent person in the exercise of ordinary care could not use with safety,[43] or that the crossing is a much traveled one,[44] and the noise of approaching trains is rendered indistinct and the ordinary signals difficult to be heard by reason of bustle and confusion incident to railroad or other business,[45] or by reason of some other such cause.[46]

In determining whether a railroad crossing is extrahazardous within this rule, each case must be viewed in the light of its own facts.[47] It has been held that, unless the railroad company knew, or in the exercise of ordinary care should have known, of the hazardous condition of the crossing, it is not negligent,[48] but it is held to have recognized the dangerous character of the crossing where it has maintained a flagman there[49] or erected gates,[50] or where a statement was made to a public officer that plans for maintaining certain safeguards were under consideration.[51]

Unless required by statute, a railroad company ordinarily is under no obligation to keep a flagman at the crossings of public country roads[52] or private roads,[53] or at a crossing which is in a sparsely settled locality,[54] as in a residence district,[55] or at a branch line street crossing,[56] or at a flag station,[57] or at a crossing in a small town sons cannot use it with safety unless extraordinary means are used to approach such place—Hopp v Northern Pac Ry. Co., 147 P 2d 950, 20 Wash 2d 439.

Rule that maintenance of gates at a crossing is a nondelegable duty of railroad is inapplicable to case of private crossing, where company contracted with railroad to maintain and operate crossing gates at private crossing, railroad was entitled to assume, in absence of notice to contrary, that company would perform its undertaking.—Peppin v Boston & M. or village,[58] or where, although the view is obstructed, the train could have been seen by the person injured before he reached the track, and the ordinary signals were adequate to apprise him of the danger.[59] The duty of a railroad company to provide a flagman at a crossing cannot be inferred alone from the fact that trains are operated over the crossing at high speed.[60] Where a company obeys an order of a public service commission and provides certain safeguards, it is not negligent in failing to maintain gates or a flagman.[61]

Crossing obstructed by train or cars. Ordinarily railroads are under no duty to station an employee at a crossing to warn travelers that the crossing is obstructed by a train, or part thereof,[62] or to maintain a gate under such circumstances,[63] where conditions at the crossing are not of such an unusual and dangerous nature as to make it necessary to take such precautions,[64] since the primary purpose of gates and watchmen at crossings is to warn travelers of approaching trains, not of standing ones.[65] Accordingly, negligence on the part of the railroad company is not established by the fact that an automobile collides with a train standing on a crossing unprotected by a gate, flag, or light,[66] or where signal flags are absent, where such flags are for the guidance of employees and not travelers upon the highway.[67] However, a railroad company may be required to provide a watchman at an abnormally dangerous crossing where circumstances make his use reasonably necessary to give warning of cars already on a crossing, whether standing or passing, as where a crossing is more than ordinarily dangerous because of obstructions interfering with visibility[68] or because of weather conditions, such as fog, rendering visibility poor.[69] So where a railroad company permits a box car to remain across a walk used by pedestrians, without posting a flagman in a proper position to warn of the approaching trains, the company has been held negligent.[70]

a flagman or gate, it is bound to perform the duty with due care and employ fit and competent persons; and, where a flagman has constantly been maintained at a crossing, unless reasonable notice be given the traveling public a withdrawal of such service may constitute negligence.

If a railroad company assumes the duty to maintain a flagman or gate, it is bound to perform the duty with due care,[71] and whether or not the duty has been imposed by law is immaterial.[72] It has been held, however, that the failure of the company to operate gates, where there is no statutory requirement therefor, is not negligence where the exercise of due care did not require the maintenance of the gate under the circumstances prevailing at the time of the accident.[73] The fact that maintaining watchmen on both sides of the train at a crossing might have averted a collision does not show that a railroad guarding only one side was negligent.[74] An order by a town council requiring a flagman at a certain crossing, without specifying the time for so doing, requires a flagman both by night and by day.[75]

A railroad which selected a watchman to control a private crossing constructed for use by a contractor has been held responsible to persons entitled to use the crossing for the watchman's negligence.[76] A brakeman engaged in switching cars who was not a regular flagman for a crossing, but who acted in that capacity by giving a signal to a motorist that the crossing was clear, and the brakeman's employer, were bound by the brakeman's conduct to be measured by the general rules applying to flagmen, in determining the liability of the railroad for injuries to a motorist struck by a train at the crossing.[77]

Fitness or competency of flagmen or watchmen. Where a flagman or watchman is employed at a public highway crossing, until the public has become accustomed to regard his presence or absence as one of the evidences of the approach of trains, or otherwise, it is part of the company's duty to keep a fit person there whose conduct will not be liable to mislead and deceive the traveling public,[78] thus it is negligence to provide a watchman who is incapable of reasonably discharging his duties because of any physical disability,[79] such as age[80] or epilepsy.[81] It has been held, however, that the railroad company is not liable for negligence in employing and retaining an incompetent flagman,[82] but is liable only for his negligence which was the proximate cause of an injury.[83]

Withdrawal of flagman. Where a flagman has constantly been maintained at a crossing, unless reasonable notice be given the traveling public a withdrawal of such service may constitute negligence,[84] but where a company voluntarily installed an automatic signal at a crossing to lessen the hours a watchman is maintained there such partial withdrawal is not negligence,[85] although travelers are not given notice of such shortening of a watchman's hours on duty.[86] The company may, however, abandon the keeping of a flagman at any time without being negligent where his purpose is only to prevent collision between the cars of two different railroads.[87] Where there was no custom of a railroad to flag a crossing for the train involved in the accident but only to flag through trains, and the railroad posted no notice specifying that the crossing would be flagged for the train involved in the accident, the railroad has been held under no duty to protect the crossing for the train involved.[88]

(2) Duties of Flagmen or Gatemen
(a) In general
(b) Warnings or signals of approach of trains

(a) In General

Where a flagman is employed or a gate established, the person in charge is bound to perform his duties with reasonable care and prudence, and a failure to do so is negligence for which the railroad company is liable. It is negligence for a gatekeeper or flagman to leave his post, knowing that an engine is approaching, without giving some signal of danger, but after a train has reached the crossing the duty of the gatekeeper or flagman ends as to that train and he may then leave his post of duty.

Where a flagman is employed or a gate established, the person in charge is bound to perform his duties with reasonable care and prudence, and a failure to do so is negligence for which the railroad company is liable.[89] On the other hand, a flagman or watchman is not negligent if he acts with due care under the circumstances,[90] and it has further been held that an act done by a crossing watchman on a sudden emergency when life is apparently in peril, although it is not the wisest action he could have taken, does not constitute negligence.[91]

The public has a right, when the gates are open, or the flagman not in his accustomed place of duty, to presume, in the absence of knowledge to the contrary, that the gateman or flagman is properly discharging his duties, and it is negligence for a gatekeeper or flagman to leave his post, knowing that an engine is approaching, without giving some signal of danger.[92] After the train has reached the crossing, however, the duty of the gatekeeper or flagman ends as to that train,[93] and such person is not negligent in then leaving his post of duty,[94] since the train itself is then a sufficient warning.[95]

The flagman must station himself in such a position as to give adequate warning to those about to cross.[96] A flagman is not standing at the crossing when he is at one end or at the side of a crossing over a large number of tracks,[97] but he is not expected to look both ways in the street at once or to stand on both sides of the crossing.[98]

Where contractor repairing road stationed crossing tender at railroad crossing to warn travelers, if railroad relied wholly on crossing tender to give necessary warning, railroad adopted him as its agent to perform that duty and would be answerable for his negligence, and railroad could not escape liability for collision resulting because of crossing tender's negligence on ground that as to railroad crossing tender was a mere volunteer—Lemieux v. Time to cross in safety

(1) Fact that crossing watchman waved stop signal and commanded motorist to turn back did not authorize recovery against railroad for motorist's death, resulting when motorist, turning automobile around, became confused and backed car into train, notwithstanding watchman knew motorist had time to cross tracks safely.—Chumley v Louisville & N R Co, 165 S E 917, 45 Ga App 732.

(2) Where driver of automobile approaching four-track grade crossing failed to stop, look, and listen, and did not heed watchman's warning until automobile had started across first track, and because of his inexpertness as a driver stalled on second track on which passenger train was approaching, mere fact that if watchman had said nothing automobile probably would have cleared approaching train by a few seconds did not establish negligence on part of watchman which would authorize a recovery by guest in automobile against railroad—Mayer v. Duty to stop approaching trains Where a flagman discovers that his warning is undiscovered or unheeded, it has been held his duty to flag the approaching train when this can be done before the danger is imminent,[99] since the train and travelers both have the right to use the crossing;[1] but a flagman is not generally required to stop a train to allow travelers to cross,[2] and where a flagman fails to stop trains which might strike an automobile which has stalled upon the tracks there is no negligence.[3]

Duty to assist in controlling horses. It has been held not the duty of a flagman to hold the heads of horses while a train is passing.[4]

(b) Warnings or Signals of Approach of Trains

It is the duty of a flagman or watchman to use reasonable care to know and give timely warning of the near approach of trains so as to avoid a collision, and the railroad company is liable if the flagman or watchman fails to give any warning, as by failing to raise a flag or stop sign, or if he erroneously signals a person to cross as the train is approaching.

It is the duty of a flagman or watchman to use reasonable care to know and give timely warning of the near approach of trains so as to avoid a collision,[5] and also to enable a traveler approaching a crossing, in the exercise of reasonable care, to protect himself against other accidents,[6] as from the acts of frightened animals.[7] The public has a right to rely on a reasonable performance of that duty.[8] Since the mere presence of a watchman is insufficient to constitute a warning,[9] the company is liable if the flagman or watchman neglects to give any warning,[10] as by failing to raise a flag[11] or stop sign.[12] A watchman should warn of the approach of a hand car as well as of trains,[13] although the statute requires a warning only for trains.[14]

Sufficiency. A railroad sufficiently complies with the order of a public utility commission to maintain a flagman at a crossing by providing a man whose duty it is to warn the public by waving a flag,[15] and if he so warns the public it is sufficient,[16] and it is not important that he does not stand in the exact middle of the highway[17] or that he waves a white flag[18] or a white lantern.[19] Warning should be given in such a manner that it will be understood by the ordinary person under such cir-

No invitation to cross
Fact that gateman at railroad crossing waved white and not red lantern did not constitute invitation to truck driver to cross tracks in front of approaching train so as to render railroad liable for death of truck driver where automatic red lights were properly working and there was no evidence that truck driver had any reason to believe white lantern was an invitation to cross tracks—Rohthstein v Boston & Maine R. R., 2 N.E 2d 205, 294 Mass 423.

cumstances to be a warning of danger.[20] Where the gates at a crossing are lowered, a further warning need not be given, since such gates are in themselves a sufficient warning.[21]

Time. The railroad company is responsible where the flagman does not give a warning until the traveler is in great danger,[22] especially where the view of the approaching train is obstructed[23] and no signals are given by it.[24] It has been held that a flagman should allow travelers time to cross at ordinary speed with a fair margin of safety,[25] but where it is apparent that the traveler can cross in safety, the train being sufficiently far away, the failure to give warning is not necessarily negligence.[26] Thus a flagman is not bound to allow a margin of safety for a stalling automobile, where such stalling upon the tracks would not be anticipated by a prudent person.[27] It has been held that the signal should be given to the driver of a team at such time as would enable the driver to stop without his horses being dangerously frightened, if they are ordinarily well broken and gentle,[28] or, if they are not, to turn around and drive to a point of safety.[29]

Effect. Where a watchman or flagman erroneously signals a person to cross who is then struck by a train, the company is liable.[30] Where crossing gates were not lowered, the mere fact that the flagman attempted to signal the person injured not to cross does not free the railroad company from negligence unless such signal was given in time for such person, by the exercise of reasonable care, to avoid the injury.[31]

(3) Construction and Sufficiency of Gates

Gates should be constructed so that they may be seen, and it may be negligence not to place lights on the arms of gates.

Gates should be constructed so that they can be seen.[32] They need not be strong enough to withstand the shock of a runaway team colliding therewith.[33] It is proper to have gates on two different crossings operated by one gatekeeper in a tower.[34] A railroad is under no duty to a pedestrian to maintain gates extending over the sidewalk as well as the street, since gates are not intended to make it impossible to go upon the tracks but only to give warning that a train is approaching.[35]

Lights. It may be negligence not to place lights on the arms of gates,[36] but it is not necessary to have a light on the arm of the gate if other lighting enables a person to see the arm of the gate.[37]

(4) Operation and Attendance of Gates

Where gates are established, it is negligence if they are not constructed, attended, and maintained with ordinary care and prudence so as to give the proper warning of an approaching train; and nonuse of the accustomed gates at a crossing when trains are passing may in itself amount to negligence, or at least a circumstance from which negligence may be found.

When margin of safety insufficient.
Under watchman's duty to observe movement of trains and warn persons about to cross tracks of danger, those who seek to cross are to be given a reasonable opportunity to get over safely with a safe margin added in view of chance that something might occur to retard or entirely stop their progress, hence margin of safety which permits but a bare crossing with but a few seconds to spare if nothing happened is insufficient.—Mayer v. Where gates are established, it is negligence if they are not constructed, attended, and maintained, with ordinary care and prudence, so as to give the proper warning of an approaching train,[38] and also to prevent collisions between travelers,[39] but the existence of safety gates at a crossing does not make the railroad an insurer of a pedestrian's safety in crossing the tracks.[40] The gates should be operated so as not to injure a passer-by by the manner in which they are maintained or closed.[41] Where one side of the gates failed to operate, the condition has been held to be a trap.[42] Where crossing gates at a private crossing are out of repair but a few hours, the fact that trains passed the crossing frequently does not charge the railroad with notice of condition of the crossing gates.[43] It has been held that a railroad's failure to repair and operate gates at a crossing at which it is not required to maintain gates is not in and of itself actionable negligence.[44]

Injuries occasioned by descending gates Open gates at a crossing have been held to be affirmative assurance to a traveler that he will not be imperiled in crossing by the descent of a gate arm.[45] Ordinary care requires a gatekeeper to keep the gates under control at all times,[46] and to keep his eyes constantly on the street while lowering them.[47] The gatekeeper cannot presume that a pedestrian will not walk under a gate while it is being lowered.[48] The railroad company is not liable where a stranger, without authority from the gatekeeper and while his back is turned, lowers the gates and injures a person crossing the tracks.[49]

Allowing gates to remain open. Nonuse of the accustomed gates at a street crossing when trains are passing may in itself amount to negligence,[50] or at least a circumstance from which negligence may be found,[51] except as to one who sees the train going in front of him.[52] So where a train is allowed to approach too near to the crossing before the gates are lowered, the company may be held liable for the resulting injury.[53] It is negligence not to lower the gates as required, although no person is seen approaching the tracks.[54]

If the gates are required to be operated but part of the day, a failure to operate them more than that is not negligence since travelers are presumed to know the law;[55] but, where the company voluntarily operates such gates, if it operates them only part of the day reasonable notice should be given of such hours.[56] A railroad may not be deemed negligent for complying with an order of the commission requiring it to maintain at a crossing gates for use at certain times only as well as automatic signals, although the fact that the gates were open at other times might be misleading.[57] Where the mechanism of such gates is out of repair, preventing operation of them, a reasonable alternative should be adopted to warn travelers.[58]

§ 729. —— Persons Entitled to Protection

The protection of the rule requiring a flagman or gates at a crossing extends only to persons crossing the railroad tracks at such crossing by way of the highway, or to persons lawfully on the right of way and approaching the crossing.

The protection of the rule requiring a flagman or gates at a crossing extends only to persons crossing the railroad tracks at such crossing by way of the highway,[59] or to persons lawfully on the right of way and approaching the crossing,[60] and not to persons approaching the crossing by wrongfully walking along the railroad track before turning onto the highway,[61] or to persons crossing outside the limits of the highway,[62] or to other trespassers.[63]

It may not be negligence on the part of the railroad company not to provide gates or a watchman at a crossing where the person using such crossing is familiar with it,[64] or is not paying attention and the train is in clearer view than a flagman would have been,[65] since a railroad company is not required to keep a flagman to warn reckless travelers.[66] It has also been held, however, that the railroad company is not relieved from its duty to provide a flagman, if required to do so, by the fact that a person approaching the crossing is familiar therewith,[67] or by the fact that the injured person drove on the crossing believing the train which caused the injury to be standing still,[68] and that the failure of the railroad company to provide a flagman is no less negligence because the person using the crossing knew of such failure.[69] Where the injured person knew one track was in use at the time and did not rely on the gates but on his own senses while crossing the track, it is immaterial whether he was within the class for whose benefit such gates should be maintained.[70]

§ 730. —— Effect of Statutes or Ordinances

Where safeguards at public crossings are prescribed by statute, ordinance, or order of a commission, it is negligence per se not to use such precautions, and such negligence is not excused by the taking of precautions other than the prescribed ones. The reasonable need for crossing protection in addition to the warnings required by statute is to be determined by the special and unusual dangers of the particular crossing.

Where safeguards at public crossings are prescribed by statute, ordinance,[71] or order of a commission,[72] it is negligence per se not to use such precautions, as where the railroad company fails to comply with a statute, ordinance, or other governmental regulation with respect to having a flagman,[73] or gates,[74] or automatic signals,[75] or lights,[76] or signboards.[77] So where, in violation of a municipal ordinance, the railroad company fails to place a light on a temporary obstruction in the street, the company may be liable for an injury resulting from such failure.[78] It has been held, however, that failure to comply with a statutory requirement does not automatically place responsibility for a crossing accident on the railroad.[79] It has been held that failure to provide the safeguards prescribed by statute is evidence of negligence, although the person injured might have seen the train had he been looking.[80]

80. Puerto Rico.—Dominguez v Porto Rico R., etc., Co., 19 Puerto Rico 1034.

The failure of a railroad to take the precautions required by statute has been held to constitute negligence not excused by the taking of any other precautions.[81] So, a substitution of a flagman for gates required by a statute is negligence per se,[82] and the failure of a railroad company to provide a flagman required by statute is negligence per se, although automatic signals are provided.[83] A traveler over a railroad crossing may rely on the performance by the company of its duty under a statute or ordinance to provide safeguards, as discussed infra § 792; but, even if a traveler over the crossing is ignorant of such a statute or ordinance, the negligence of the company in not providing a watchman is not affected.[84] A railroad may be liable for the consequences of its negligence in failing to operate gates as required by ordinance, although the person injured has knowledge that the ordinance is not being complied with[85]

At an ordinary crossing and in the absence of any unusual circumstances the erection of a sign or signaling device as required by statute or ordinance is a sufficient performance of the railroad's duty and it may not be considered to be negligent for failure to furnish a warning of the presence of a crossing and of the approach of trains in addition to the signs or signals required by the statute, ordinance,[86] or order of the commission[87] However, a statute or commission order requiring a railroad to erect suitable warning devices prescribes the minimum of care which must be observed, and does not furnish a standard by which to determine in every case whether or not the railroad has failed to discharge its duty with respect to giving sufficient warning of the presence of the crossing and of the approach of trains.[88] In other words, the reasonable need for crossing protection in addition to the warnings required by statute is to be determined by the special and unusual dangers of the particular crossing[89] Under the doctrine of the existence of exceptional conditions at a crossing calling for precautions on the part of

Fog warnings

Where crossing on highway was in open country on almost level ground and fog conditions were not of such character that ordinary care required the installation of fog warnings, railroad was not required to furnish warnings other than those prescribed by the railroad and warehouse commission.—Rhine v. Common-law requirement

(1) Mere fact that railroad had fully complied with requirements of commission on subject of warning devices at railroad crossing at which collision occurred did not necessarily satisfy common-law requirement of due care and therefore absolve railroad from negligence.—Northern Pac. Ry. Co. v. Haugan, C.A.Minn, 184 F 2d 472.

(2) Installation of an electric warning signal at a railroad grade crossing in compliance with statutory duty is alone not conclusive proof that the railroad's common-law duty to provide adequate warning has been complied with, since the common-law duty exists in all cases where circumstances render statutory warning inadequate in fact, the statutory requirement being merely the minimum precaution—John F Ivory Storage Co. v Atlantic Coast Line R Co, 48 S E 2d 242, 187 Va 857

General duty not abolished

Statute authorizing commission to require certain warnings at railroad crossings, not being a code of regulations for running of railroad trains and not being authority for commission to make such code, does not abolish general duty of railroads to exercise care in addition to that required by statute or order of commission, where prudent management and operation of railroad require precautions for public safety.—Licha v Northern Pac Ry. Co., 276 N W. 813, 201 Minn. 427.

Special circumstances

(1) Where special circumstances in existence at time of accident involving train and automobile on railroad crossing may establish that extra hazards are present at railroad crossing, burden may fall on railroad to provide signals or protection therefor beyond statutory requirements or commission's regulations.—Blaske v. Northern Pac. Ry Co, 37 N.W 2d 758, 228 Minn. 444

(2) Where snowstorms were not unusual in winter months in locality where railroad crossing was located, an unlighted wooden cross-arm sign on left-hand side of highway at crossing would not be a sufficient warning to highway users of presence of crossing unless it would be visible in snowstorms not unusual to the vicinity—Southern Pac Co. v Haight, C C A Cal., 126 F 2d 900, certiorari denied 63 S Ct. 154, 317 U S 676, 87 L Ed 542

the railroad company in addition to the statutory signals, the exceptional condition must be one known to the railroad or one which has existed for such a length of time that the railroad, in the exercise of ordinary care, should have known that the crossing was unusually dangerous,[90] and the mere fact that smoke from a locomotive mingled with the darkness of night and an incline in the highway leading to the crossing operated to obscure a motorist's view of a train moving on the crossing has been held not to create an exceptional condition within the rule.[91]

§ 731. Mode of Running or Operating at Crossings

The rules of law as to the mode of running or operating cars or trains at crossings ordinarily apply alike to the operators of a railroad and those permissively using its facilities.

The rules of law as to the mode of running or operating cars or trains at crossings ordinarily apply alike to the operators of a railroad and those permissively using its facilities,[92] but statutes applicable to railroad companies only have no application to other companies operating cars or trains at a crossing.[93] Statutes requiring certain precautions of a railroad have been held applicable to private, as well as to public, railroads.[94]

§ 732. —— Care Required in General

In operating trains at a crossing, a railroad company must exercise the degree of care imposed in a given case by statute or arising under the common law, and ordinarily the company must, through its engineers, firemen, and other employees, use such reasonable care and precaution to avoid injuring a person at the crossing, as the circumstances reasonably require; but the railroad is not an insurer of the safety of travelers using the crossing.

As a general rule, with respect to the care required to be exercised in operating cars or trains at crossings, the operators of a railroad or those permissively using its facilities must exercise the degree of care imposed in a given case by statute or arising under the common law.[95] While a railroad company has the right as against one approaching a crossing to operate its engines and cars in the usual and ordinary way and to make such noises or movements as are usually and necessarily made by trains in motion under similar circumstances,[96] the company must, through its engineers, firemen, and other employees, use such reasonable care and precaution in operating its trains and cars at crossings, to avoid injuring a person thereat, as the circumstances reasonably require,[97] or else, under the circumstances of the

The duty of a traveler on a highway to look and listen before going on a railroad track does not excuse the operators of the train from also exercising due care.—Canion v Southern Pac Co., 80 P.2d 397, 52 Ariz 245

Safe crossing

Railroad must so regulate its trains as to enable driver to cross tracks safely if he has properly stopped, looked, and listened.—Haller v Pennsylvania R. Co., 159 A. 10, 306 Pa. 98.

Nighttime

(1) Railroad has common-law duty to exercise care enabling traveler on highway reasonably to ascertain particular case, be considered to be negligent[98] If it fails to exercise the requisite care by reason whereof a person approaching or using the crossing with reasonable care is injured, it is liable therefor,[99] even though the injury did not result from the train striking the vehicle[1] Such care is required while passing over a crossing as well as in approaching the crossing,[2] and is required not only as to persons who may be on the track, but also as to persons in close proximity thereto who may be about to cross,[3] and the duty is not affected by the fact that the person crossing had just previously been a trespasser on the company's platform.[4]

The duty of a railroad company to exercise due care in operating its cars or trains at a crossing exists independently of, and in addition to, statutes or ordinances requiring a railroad company to perform certain precautionary acts in approaching a crossing[5] In other words, the requirements of such regulations do not constitute the maximum measure of care demanded of a railroad,[6] and a railroad company will not be held free from negligence merely because it has complied literally with various safety statutes,[7] since neither the legislature nor the railroad commission can foresee in advance what would, under all circumstances, constitute ordinary care.[8]

The degree of care required in operating cars or trains at a crossing is only what under the circumstances of the particular case is ordinary care,[9] or in other words, such care as an ordinarily pru-

in nighttime approach of train—Wagner v. Toledo, P. & W. R R, 185 N.E. 236, 352 Ill 85—Trumbo v Chicago, B. & Q. R Co, 54 N E 2d 258, 322 Ill App. 277, reversed on other grounds 59 N E 2d 92, 389 Ill 213.

(2) Fact that a person with knowledge that he was approaching a railroad crossing might, by exercise of reasonable care, discover approach of train in daytime would have no bearing on duty of railroad toward strangers to locality who approached crossing at night—Whipple v Boston & Maine R R, 7 A.2d 239, 90 N.H. 261.

Private passageway

Employees in charge of train must anticipate that persons will be on track at given place and must use ordinary care to prevent injury to such persons, where employees are aware that number of persons, with knowledge of and without disapproval of railway, habitually used private passageway to cross tracks at such place—Southern Ry. Co. v Waldrup, 45 S E 2d 775, 76 Ga App 356.

Particular factors

(2) A railroad operating its trains on thoroughfare of a city must use greater care than in less frequented localities—Lowry v. Seaboard Airline R Co., C A Fla, 171 F 2d 625

The extent of travel on a highway over a railroad crossing is an element to be considered in determining whether adequate precautions have been taken by railroad or its employees for the protection of travelers—Mannino v. Boston & M R R, 14 N E 2d 122, 300 Mass. 71.

Additional precautions

(1) If a crossing is a much traveled thoroughfare and, because of its location, unusually dangerous, sound of train whistle or ringing of bell is not sufficient, but it is further duty of railroad to use such other means to prevent injury as ordinarily prudent person would use—Franklin v Louisville & N R Co, 102 S W 2d 1010, 267 Ky 577

(2) If railroad crossing, because of obstructing trees and undergrowth, was hazardous and much used by public to knowledge of train crew for reasonable time prior to accident, crew had duty, in addition to ringing bell or sounding whistle and maintaining lookout, to use such other means at their command to avoid injuring those using crossing, including victim of accident, as, in exercise of reasonable judgment, an ordinarily prudent person would have used.—Hopper v. in so doing they exercise ordinary care,[16] and it is not required to exercise great care and prudence,[17] or the highest possible care,[18] or care which shall necessarily and in all cases be sufficient, efficient, and effective,[19] or such care and skill as the most prudent are accustomed to exercise,[20] or such care as an ordinarily prudent person "could" have used.[21]

The rule requiring the exercise of ordinary care in operating cars or trains at crossings does not call for the performance of any act outside of, or disconnected with, the actual operation of the railroad.[22] Also, the company owes no duty forcibly to prevent a person from coming in contact with its moving train at a crossing[23] Although a vehicle approaching the crossing should stop until the train has passed, as discussed infra § 774, the train should not, by stopping at the crossing or moving backward and forward, subject the vehicle to unreasonable delay.[24] Ordinary care on the part of a train engineer on approaching a public crossing requires vigilance to guard against a dangerous situation reasonably to be apprehended as well as one actually imminent[25]

Negligent acts. A railroad company is not liable for accidents at crossings unless its employees were negligent.[26] The negligence causing the injury need not relate particularly to the person injured, but it is sufficient to render the railroad company liable if it is a failure to perform an obligation owing to the public generally;[27] nor can the question whether certain acts constitute negligence depend on whether other railroad companies forbid or permit them[28] In determining whether there was negligence in the operation of a train at a crossing, the condition of the machinery and track with relation to the speed, the environment, the speed in relation to the environment, and the signals given must be considered.[29] Accordingly, it has been held negligent to run trains in such a manner as to make statutory signals unavailing,[30] to run a hand car in front of a freight train,[31] or to open a train at a public crossing where travelers are waiting to cross the track and then close it without giving them time to cross,[32] whether or not signals are given,[33] and the moving of cars near a street crossing, although done in the usual manner, may constitute negligence as to persons using the track[34] It may also constitute negligence to violate duties imposed by statute or ordinance.[35]

The fact that a railroad train is behind time does not show negligence on the part of the company in approaching a crossing,[36] nor is a higher degree of care required in such cases.[37] The act of a railroad in permitting its train to leave a town ahead of schedule, even if negligence, is in no sense a breach of any duty owed to a motorist on the theory that, if the train had left on scheduled time, it would not have reached the crossing until after the automobile had passed in safety[38] Likewise, there is no negligence in failing to sidetrack a train in accordance with a previous custom known to the traveler at a crossing,[39] or in properly operating a train over a guarded crossing.[40] Emission of a cinder the size of a pinhead from an engine is not negligence per se,[41] nor is attaching a stake to an engine or tender on one track and extending it diagonally across to a car on another track for the purpose of shoving the car along by the engine.[42]

Duty to stop. The company owes no duty to stop its trains at a crossing[43] or a switch or transfer track[44] except to avoid a known or probable accident,[45] and there is no duty to stop at all stations on the road, even though an injury at a crossing near a station might thereby be avoided[46] Likewise, a train approaching a crossing need not be so operated that it can be brought instantly to a stop at the crossing at any time, no matter how short the notice or how sudden the emergency.[47] However, a person injured at a street crossing, where street railroad tracks also crossed, may avail himself of a statute requiring trains to come to a full stop before a railroad crossing,[48] or of an ordinance requiring trains to come to a stop at street railroad crossings[49]

Rules of company. It has been held that the violation of the rules of a railroad company by its employees constitutes negligence for which the railroad is liable when such rules have been adopted in the interest of safety.[50] A rule of the company with respect to the conduct of its employees concerning "railroad crossings at grade" does not apply where a railroad crosses a highway at grade,[51] but means a crossing of two lines of railroad at grade.[52]

The intent of city timetable requirement that all trains, yard cuts, or engines must approach a highway or street crossing at grade with caution, prepared to stop, crossing whistle sounded, and bell ringing until engine passes over crossing, is merely that trains and engines anticipate necessity of stopping for a blocked crossing, in contradistinction to trains and engines which operate on main lines, and which may and must operate in expectation that crossings will be open, and such rule does not require trains and engines to be so operated that they can be brought instantly to a stop at a crossing—Bordenave v. performed with proper precautions; but, since the operation of cars or trains in such a manner is especially dangerous, the railroad company is bound to exercise special precautions to avoid injuries to persons lawfully on or approaching the track.

As a general rule, backing engines or trains or running unattended cars over a crossing is not negligence if performed with proper precautions [53] The fact, however, that the company is engaged in switching does not relieve it from exercising care in crossing a public street [54] Since the operation of cars or trains in such a manner is especially dangerous, the railroad company is bound to exercise special precautions to avoid injuries to persons lawfully on or approaching the track,[55] particularly where the crossing is infrequently used for switching purposes,[56] or where the train movement occurs at night [57] Accordingly, the railroad may be negligent if it backs its engines or trains or runs unattended cars without proper lookouts,[58] or without proper lights,[59] or other signals or warnings,[60] and without taking such other precautions for the safety of travelers as the circumstances reasonably require.[61] Merely ringing the engine bell[62] or blowing the whistle[63] does not necessari-

In suit by motorist for damage to automobile when struck at crossing by train which was being backed over switch track at night, facts that whistle of locomotive was blown and bell was rung did not relieve defendant of negligence for failing to have light on lead car as it backed over crossing, where locomotive was over six hundred feet back of lead car.—Dobrowolski v Holloway Gravel Co., supra.

ly absolve the company from the duty of taking other precautions, the means of warning should be as effective on a backing train as on an advancing unreversed train.[64]

Statutory provisions In some jurisdictions the duty of observing particular precautions is required by statute, and the company is liable for injuries resulting from failure to comply therewith,[65] and such failure is negligence per se[66] Under the terms of such statutes, an ordinary lantern in the hand of a brakeman on the top of a car is not a "conspicuous light."[67] An ordinance requiring a company running a locomotive, car, or train backward to provide a watchman at the rear end thereof requires, when backing an engine with a tender, a watchman on the rear of the tender,[68] and a watchman on the rear of the locomotive in such case is insufficient.[69] Under a statute requiring a railroad to keep a "lookout ahead" on a locomotive, it has been held that there is absolute liability on a railroad for injuries inflicted when its train is moving backward, or by means of an engine placed elsewhere than in front, since the statute is complied with only when a train is moving forward by means of an engine at its front;[70] but there is no absolute liability under the statute where an accident occurs while an engine is operated backward with the tender in front, and the engineer is actually on the lookout ahead of his engine[71]

b. "Kicking Cars" or Making "Flying Switches"

As a general rule, it is not negligence per se on the part of a railroad company to "kick" cars or to make "running" or "flying switches" over a highway crossing not in a populous town or city, or when proper precautions are taken for the safety of travelers using the crossing, but, since such a practice is peculiarly dangerous, it creates a duty of unusual care on the part of the company

§ 734. Lights, Signals, and Lookouts on Trains and Cars

A railroad company has the burden to exercise care to safeguard users of a highway against injury by making provision for adequate warning by lights or signals on its cars or trains which approach or cross a grade crossing

As a general rule, a railroad has the burden to exercise care to safeguard users of a highway against injury by making provision for adequate warning of danger by lights or signals on its cars or trains which approach or cross a grade crossing[81] The omission or nonoperation of signals and other warnings required or customarily given to indicate the approach of a train to a crossing is equivalent to an assurance by the railroad that no train is in fact approaching, and constitutes an invitation by the railroad to travelers on the highway to proceed toward and over the crossing.[82] Whether a railroad was negligent with respect to performance of its statutory duty to give warning of the approach of trains to a crossing must be determined by the circumstances of the particular case.[83]

Trains or cars occupying crossing. Generally, since actual occupancy by a train of a crossing constitutes notice and warning of its presence, the railroad company need not give other warning to a traveler on the highway by lights or signals on the train,[84] in the absence of unusual conditions creating an extraordinary hazard,[85] but this rule of law may be inapplicable where the train came onto the crossing when the car was within less than stopping distance.[86] So it is generally held, although there is some authority to the contrary,[87] that the failure of a railroad to give the signal or warning required by statute in approaching a crossing is immaterial once the train has occupied the crossing and the traveler then collides therewith,[88] since the object of statutes imposing re-

Where railroad motor car, which had been standing a short distance from crossing, obscured from view of motorist by shrubbery, gave no warning that it was about to start, and motor car and automobile arrived at crossing at nearly the same time, presence of motor car on crossing was not sufficient warning to motorist that crossing was occupied.—Smith v Chicago, B & Q R Co., 291 N W 417, 227 Iowa 1404, followed in 291 N W. 422, 227 Iowa 1404

Intent of signals

quirements as to signals is to warn of the approach of trains, and not to give warning of the presence of a train on the crossing, or to prevent a traveler from running into a train so situated, as discussed infra § 736 b (1), and the requirement that warning devices be operated until the crossing is "passed" does not necessitate the continuance of signals once the engine has passed and the crossing is entirely occupied by the train or car, as discussed infra § 736 b (2). On the other hand, the failure to operate warning signals and devices may constitute negligence where the crossing is extrahazardous by reason of peculiar circumstances or conditions,[89] and the situation constitutes a trap.[90] The duty of a railroad as to obstructions at crossings generally is considered supra § 720, and the duty to provide safeguards at the crossing for cars blocking the crossing is considered generally supra § 725.

§ 735. —— Lights

In the night or when it is dark, the common-law duty of reasonable care may require that a railroad company give some signal by light so that persons at a crossing may see an approaching train, and ordinarily the absence of warning lights constitutes evidence of negligence to be considered in connection with other circumstances.

In the night[91] or when it is dark[92] or dusk dark,[93] the common-law duty of reasonable care may require that a railroad company give some signal by light so that persons at a crossing may see an approaching train.[94] Such light should be of a kind calculated to attract the attention of travelers at or near the crossing,[95] indicating to them the approach of the train toward the crossing,[96] such as a headlight,[97] or, if the train is backing toward the crossing, an appropriate bright light on the rear of the train to show that fact,[98] and, although there is a light on the forward end of a backing train, if it is of such a character as not to suggest the approach of such train to the crossing to a reasonably cautious man, it does not suffice.[99] Likewise, the presence of a headlight will not fulfill the company's duty if the headlight is clouded and obscured[1] or if it is turned down so low as to be ineffective.[2]

Ordinarily the absence of warning lights constitutes evidence of negligence to be considered in connection with other circumstances,[3] such as the amount of light.[4] When coupled with the failure to give proper signals of approach, the absence of proper lights from moving cars or trains approaching a crossing in a city or where per-

Curve in highway

Where motorist approaching railroad crossing in country at night could not see the crossing or train thereon until after turning curve in highway near the crossing, failure of railroad to blow whistle on approaching the crossing was negligence, as against contention that the fact that the train was already on the crossing and a number of its cars had already passed when the automobile rounded the curve and struck the train was sufficient notice of the presence of the train—Southern Ry Co. v. (2) Although the mere absence of lights or mere irregular order of cars is not of itself negligent, where the two concur, and further, the cars are run at irregular intervals, a case of negligence is made out as a matter of law—Principe v. American R Co., 22 Puerto Rico 282

sons may reasonably be expected is negligence as a matter of law,[5] and especially when such train is running at a rapid speed[6] or is backing toward the crossing.[7] On the other hand, merely having a sufficient light displayed on trains or cars does not show that the railroad has performed its full duty of due care to travelers.[8]

Statutes requiring engines to be furnished with headlights which shall be kept burning are designed to secure the protection that a useful headlight affords,[9] and not to compel such headlight to be carried where it would serve no useful purpose,[10] so that engines preceded by, and coupled to, snow plows need not have headlights.[11]

Ordinarily a railroad is under no duty to provide lights in or on cars obstructing a crossing while standing still or passing over the crossing, and its failure in this respect does not constitute negligence.[12] In order to charge a railroad with negligence in moving a train at night across a highway without lights to disclose its presence, an injured motorist must show that trainmen exercising reasonable care should know that because of darkness cars are such an obstruction that people traveling in automobiles properly equipped with lights and carefully operated at a reasonable rate of speed would be likely to come into collision with them.[13] So, where a railroad crossing is extrahazardous by reason of peculiar circumstances, the failure of the railroad to take precautionary measures such as the placing of warning lights along the train where it has stopped on the crossing or is slowly moving thereover may render the railroad liable for negligence.[14]

§ 736. —— Signals

a. In general
b. Provisions of statutes or ordinances

a. In General

A railroad company generally has the duty, apart from any imposed by statute or ordinance, to give signals of the approach of its trains or cars to crossings, and the failure to give a proper signal or warning may constitute negligence or evidence of negligence. Ordinarily, no particular or specific kind of signals or warning is necessary but it is only required that a suitable means of giving warning adapted to the circumstances be adopted and applied.

Under some decisions a specific common-law duty to give warning or notice of the approach of trains or cars to a crossing has been recognized,[15] and the failure to give a proper signal or

In Tennessee

(1) It has been held that it is generally the duty of a railroad company to give warning of approach of warning held to constitute negligence;[16] and in other jurisdictions, while no such specific duty exists,[17] the omission of warnings of approach is to be considered in connection with the duty of the railroad to operate its trains with due care and caution so as to avoid injuries to others.[18] A railroad company is not relieved from the obligation of giving signals of the approach of its trains or cars to crossings by the fact that no statute or ordinance has been adopted or is applicable to the situation and circumstances in question.[19]

Where the duty to give warning arises, the courts, in defining the character of the requisite warning, have employed varying expressions, as for example, that it should be reasonable,[20] timely,[21] adequate,[22] and in other cases that the warn its trains to crossings of its tracks with a street or highway—Corpus Juris cited in Southern Ry. Co v Penley, 134 S W 2d 177, 179, 175 Tenn 380—Louisville & N R. Co v Ross, 2 Tenn.App. 384.

(2) Where there is no statute governing the matter, the common-law liability of a railroad for negligence at highway crossings prevails, and it must give proper warning of the approach of trains—Hurt v. Yazoo, etc., R Co., 205 S W. 437, 140 Tenn 623—52 C J p 241 note 2 [c] (4)

(3) On the other hand, where statutes relating to blowing whistles or ringing bells at grade crossings conflict with the common law and undertake to define the entire duty of railroads as to warnings at every grade crossing, no common-law duty remains on railroad as to giving warning at such crossings.—Southern Ry Co v Noah, 176 S.W 2d 826, 180 Tenn 532—52 C.J. p 241 note 2 [c] (3).

Crossing in town or municipality

(1) A railroad company sued for death of passenger in automobile colliding with train at crossing in town was not relieved from its common-law duty to give adequate crossing warning by the fact that railroad was not required to give statutory crossing warning at a crossing in a town, and that town had not enacted ordinance requiring gate or flagman at crossing—Atlantic Coast Line R. ing should be proper,[23] sufficient,[24] suitable,[25] or appropriate.[26] It has also been held that the requisite warning should be due warning,[27] reasonably sufficient,[28] reasonably adequate,[29] adequate to apprise travelers,[30] reasonably calculated to arrest a traveler's attention to the danger,[31] such as may reasonably be demanded by all the surrounding conditions,[32] or reasonably necessary.[33] Other decisions have characterized the warning required as due and timely,[34] due and proper,[35] due and adequate,[36] ample and timely,[37] sufficient and timely,[38] proper and sufficient,[39] timely and effective,[40] reasonable and proper,[41] reasonable and timely,[42] or timely and proper.[43]

As a general rule, a suitable means of giving warning adapted to the circumstances must be adopted and applied.[44] Ordinarily the ringing of a bell or the blowing of a whistle constitutes sufficient warning,[45] but the law does not require any particular or specific kind of signals or warning where no specific requirement is imposed by statute or ordinance,[46] and it is not always essential that warning be given by whistle and bell[47] or either of these.[48] On the other hand, the law will

(2) If headlight of train or noise of its approach gives adequate warning to those using private crossing, or if open and unobstructed character of crossing is such as to give adequate opportunity to see and hear the train, negligence of railroad cannot be predicated on failure to give particular kind of warning.—Langer v. Locomotive not equipped with whistle

Where crossing collision occurred in incorporated city so that statutory requirement that train whistle be blown was inapplicable, failure of railroad to have locomotive engine equipped with a whistle as required by statute was not actionable negli-

not undertake to say that the giving of any certain signal or warning is sufficient[49] or that the omission of a particular kind of signal is not negligence.[50]

There is no obligation at common law to give continuous signals of approach to a crossing[51] or where the signaling statute does not expressly require that measure of care.[52] The rumble of a moving train is a warning to travelers,[53] but it is not under ordinary circumstances a sufficient warning to discharge the company's duty in this particular.[54] What constitutes a sufficient signal to fulfill the company's common-law obligation depends at all times on the circumstances,[55] and the precautions necessary to be exercised are commensurate with the danger,[56] but a railroad company cannot be required, other than where a statute so provides, to give any signals or warnings not connected with the operation of its trains or cars.[57]

A proper signal of an approach of a train constitutes notice to the public that the railroad is about to use a grade crossing and take advantage of its superior right to do so,[58] and, if the accustomed warning was given by the train crew on approaching a crossing, and the warning was adequate, the fact that it was not noticed by the persons injured does not show that the train crew was negligent.[59] It has been held, however, that the railroad company is obliged to anticipate that the traveler will fail to hear or disregard the signal when given, and to keep reasonable watch for such instances, and be prepared to protect those guilty of such carelessness;[60] and this duty is reciprocal with the duty of the traveler to anticipate that the railroad may fail to give the required signals and to act accordingly.[61] It has been held that the maintenance of an automatic crossing signal at a crossing sufficiently discharges the common-law duty of the railroad to warn of approaching trains regardless of whether the whistle and bell on the locomotive are sounded,[62] but it has also been held that the failure to give crossing signals is actionable, however adequate the warning signs at the crossing.[63] The presence of the train or car at the crossing may constitute sufficient warning to absolve the railroad company of liability without other signal by it, as discussed supra § 734.

Factors determining adequacy. Besides obstructions to view and hearing, considered infra § 741, factors taken into consideration in determining whether adequate signals of approach have been given include the character of the crossing,[64] as for example, whether it is in a town or other place where the presence of people may be expected, discussed infra § 738, the condition of the crossing,[65] the rate of speed,[66] the presence of signs or precautions at the crossing,[67] whether the train is a regularly scheduled or an extra train,[68] and other considerations relevant to the manner of running the train,[69] changes in methods of transportation along the highways,[70] and the presence or proximity of other trains or cars.[71] Multiplication of tracks passing over a highway at a particular point may be considered in determining whether such a place is more than usually hazardous,[72] although there is also authority to the contrary.[73]

Useless signals. It does not relieve the railroad of liability to signal its approach to a crossing if it does so too late for the warning to be of any value in avoiding injury,[74] or if by its own conduct it renders such signals, although properly given, unavailing.[75] The signal must be given in such manner and at such time as to be a warning to travelers at the crossing.[76]

Effect of railroad rules and regulations. Violation of regulations of the railroad requiring signals and warnings of approach at particular crossings is evidence of negligence,[77] as is disregard by its servants of whistling posts erected by it.[78]

Generally, the adequacy of a signal given by a train when approaching a crossing depends on whether warning was given soon enough in view of rapid movement of train, but adequacy of signal may depend on whether signal was given too soon, in view of retarded rate of speed of train, and in either event the question is whether warning was timely, in view of all circumstances.—Anstine v. with ordinances regulating such matters.[80] Such laws are safety measures designed for the protection of people using public thoroughfares and to afford them such warning as to insure safe passage over crossings.[81] Their object has been said to be to warn persons of danger at a railroad crossing,[82] that is, to protect persons who might come within the realm of danger of a train at the crossing,[83] but it has more restrictively been stated that the object of such statutes is to warn persons of the approach of trains to a crossing,[84] and not to warn travelers of the presence of a track,[85] or of the presence of a train on the crossing, or to prevent them from running into a train or cars occupying the crossing.[86] Such statutes, being penal in nature, are subject to the rule of strict construction,[87] but they should not be so strictly construed as to restrict to their manifest purpose of protecting travelers.[88] The repeal of a statute with respect to signals of approach results in the restoration of the common-law rule of conduct,[89] but a partial repeal restores it only to the extent to which the statutory provisions have been repealed.[90]

Statutes requiring certain signals or warnings of approach to be given at rural country crossings do not constitute a standard to be observed at street or highway crossings in towns and cities,[91] and, conversely, signals prescribed by statute for crossings in towns or cities are not the measure of a railroad's duty on approaching rural crossings.[92] A statute requiring certain signals of approach sub-

Application to United States

The United States operating a railroad in a state between military base and junction with privately owned railroad was required to comply with crossing signal statutes of the state, and failure to do so rendered the United States liable under Federal Tort Claims Act for damage to automobile in collision with diesel-electric locomotive at public highway crossing unless owner was guilty of gross contributory negligence.—Carroll v. ject to the power of towns or cities to change the requirements by ordinance applies in such places in the absence of ordinance providing other regulations,[93] as well as if an ordinance exists permitting such signals to be given in case necessity for the safety of persons at crossings requires it.[94]

On the other hand, if a statute provides that certain of the signals provided for highway crossings may be omitted at street crossings in towns and cities, unless required by ordinance, any signal so treated is not required as a matter of law in the absence of an ordinance,[95] but such a statute does not prohibit the sounding of a whistle in a city and does not excuse the railroad from sounding the whistle if it should have been sounded in the exercise of due care.[96] It is an excuse for a failure to give a particular sort of signal that the use of such signal is forbidden by ordinance,[97] but not where it is essential to the safety of persons at dangerous crossings that the forbidden signal be given.[98]

(2) Manner of Signaling or Giving Warning

Signals or warnings must be given in the manner prescribed by the statute or ordinance, and the substitution or other signals or warnings of approach for those required by the law, or the giving of the prescribed signals at times and for distances different from those demanded, does not comply with the law, and does not avoid the effect of the omission of the regulation signals; but there is no requirement that the signal be effective.

As a general rule, signals or warnings must be given in the manner prescribed by the statute or ordinance,[99] and the substitution of other signals or warnings of approach for those required by the law,[1] or the giving of the prescribed signals at times and for distances different from those demanded,[2] does not comply with the law, and does not avoid the effect of the omission of the regulation signals.[3] There is, however, no requirement that such signal shall be heard,[4] or that it be effective,[5] or that it shall be done in a manner calculated to warn of the approach of a train,[6] or that it amount to reasonable notice,[7] since a railroad is not required to give such signals as shall absolutely guarantee the safety of persons at crossings.[8] So, also, under a statute requiring the sounding of a signal at a certain distance from the crossing, no duty is imposed to give a signal warning so that it may be heard for a greater distance than that specified.[9]

Number

Three statutory blasts of train approaching highway crossing are required so that if traveler fails to hear first or second he may hear third blast.—New York Cent. R. Co. v. De Leury, 192 N.E. 125, 100 Ind.App. 140.

Bell

Under statute, an engineer approaching crossing within corporate limits of city, town, or village is required constantly to toll bell of locomotive, and is not relieved from such duty by blowing whistle of engine.—Chandler v. Pollard, 12 S.E.2d 190, 64 Ga.App. 122

Horn

Fact that remodeled automobile, operated over railway, sounded horn in time to enable automobile on highway to stop, did not preclude guest's recovery against railway, statute contemplating bell or whistle.—Sanderson v. Hartford Eastern Ry. Co., 294 P. 241, 159 Wash. 472.

Waving of lantern

Where, under statute, a railroad was bound to cause whistle or bell on locomotive to be kept ringing or whistling from a designated distance from where railroad intersected highway until highway was reached, the waving of a red lantern by watchman at crossing was not a lawful substitute for ringing of bell or sounding of whistle and did not relieve defendant from performance of statutory duty.—Amos v. Terminal R. Ass'n of St. Louis, Mo.App., 142 S.W.2d 787, applying Illinois law.

9. Miss.—Spilman v. Gulf & S. I. R. Co., 163 So. 445, 173 Miss. 725

Statutes permitting the alternative of ringing the bell or sounding the whistle on an engine after it reaches a specified distance until it passes the crossing, or requiring the sounding of a whistle at a specified distance from the crossing and allowing the use of bell or whistle thereafter until the crossing is passed, are fully satisfied by either alternative,[10] and do not require that both methods of warning shall be employed;[11] but one or the other of the required warnings must continue without cessation until the crossing has been passed.[12] A provision that within the required distance either ringing of the bell or blowing of the whistle shall be done continuously or alternately with the other permits the doing of either for any part or the whole of the prescribed distance and of the other for the remaining part thereof,[13] and does not require that the one or the other shall be done for the whole of the distance,[14] while those statutes requiring the sounding of a whistle or the ringing of a bell at a specified distance from a crossing and the continuous ringing of the bell thereafter until the crossing is passed demand only that the one or the other be done at the distance named and be followed by the ringing of the bell as provided for.[15] Where the statute requires only that the whistle be sounded at the initial point and the bell rung thereafter, the whistle need not be blown continuously from the whistling post until the crossing.[16]

A statutory provision requiring a certain signal to be given when a train or car is at least a certain distance from a crossing requires it to be given not nearer than such distance and within such distance as to serve as a reasonable warning of approach;[17] and it is not necessary that the signal in question be given precisely at the distance mentioned from the crossing.[18] Under a statute requiring the whistle to be sounded a prescribed distance from the crossing, trains starting at a shorter distance need not literally comply with the requirement as to signaling from the greater distance,[19] but, if the continuous ringing of a bell or blowing of a whistle at intervals from a prescribed distance until the crossing is demanded, such trains must give a signal of this kind from the time of starting,[20] and such conduct is a sufficient compliance with the statute.[21] Moreover, where the expressed purpose of the statute is that signals should be given for a time sufficient to give due notice of the approach of the train before the crossing is reached, it is not absolutely essential that the signals be commenced at the time the train starts to move, and it is sufficient if the signal is given in such time as to constitute adequate warning under the circumstances.[22] Statutes requiring the bell to be rung or the whistle sounded at intervals indicate that this shall be done at relatively short intervals and not at widely separated periods.[23]

Where the engine has approached the crossing with its bell ringing and has entirely passed over the crossing, the requirement of a statute that the engine bell should ring continuously until the engine has fully passed the highway crossing is satisfied,[24] and it is not required that the bell continue to be rung until the entire train has crossed the highway.[25] Likewise, under a statutory requirement that the bell be rung continuously until the "crossing is passed," it has been held that ringing of the bell is required only while the engine is passing the crossing,[26] and that the crossing is "passed" when it has become entirely occupied by the train, whereupon the obligation to continue signals no longer exists.[27] So, also, where, at the time of stopping of a train, the engine has passed over the crossing, with the coaches occupying the crossing, the engineer is not required to sound the whistle or ring the bell when the train begins to move.[28]

§ 737. —— Lookouts

A railroad company under a duty of keeping a lookout must exercise reasonable and ordinary care in this regard, and the failure of those in charge of a train to keep a lookout of the kind and at the times required by law is negligence, rendering the company liable for those injured by reason of such negligence

A railroad company may be under a duty of keeping a lookout at certain crossings, as discussed infra § 738, and its duty in this regard is the exercise of reasonable and ordinary care.[29] The character of the lookout required has been variously characterized by such terms as "vigilant,"[30] "careful,"[31] "reasonable,"[32] "proper,"[33] "continuous,"[34] "constant,"[35] "diligent,"[36] "sharp,"[37] "efficient,"[38] or "effective."[39] When a duty to keep a lookout exists, the servants of the company charged with that duty must be stationed in a position from which it is possible to see the danger,[40] but if, owing to conditions surrounding a crossing, it would not be possible to maintain a sufficient lookout on an approaching train, the failure to have a lookout will not render a railroad company liable.[41]

The duty to keep a lookout devolves on those servants of a railroad in charge of its trains, more specifically, the engineer[42] or the engineer and fireman jointly,[43] in order that the railroad may perform its duty, in certain circumstances, of looking out on both sides of the engine;[44] but it has also been held that the engineer and fireman need not both be on constant watch for travelers at a crossing.[45] The fireman must keep a lookout at any time when the engineer is so occupied or situated as to be unable to do so.[46] The railroad ordinarily need not station extra men in the engine for the purpose of keeping a lookout,[47] nor does this obligation rest on the agents or servants of a company other than those in charge of a train, in its usual and ordinary operation.[48] The trainman keeping a lookout need not keep his eyes constantly on the road,[49] and, if the safety of the passengers and the proper operation of the train make it necessary that he perform other duties which prevent his keeping a lookout, his failure to maintain a lookout cannot be regarded as negligent.[50] The mere fact that the engineer in charge of a train did not see a vehicle approaching on a highway at a crossing is not sufficient to support an inference of negligence.[51]

In order to maintain a proper lookout, the persons charged with such duty must look ahead along the track,[52] and watch out for travelers who have reached the railroad's right of way,[53] but it has been held that no duty exists to observe persons beyond the right of way,[54] such as persons near and alongside the crossing,[55] although some decisions impose the duty of lookout over a wider area.[56] The chief purpose of the lookout duty is to protect the traveling public from the consequences of its own negligence,[57] and so the fact that proper signals have been given and other precautions taken to apprise travelers at a crossing of the approach of a train will not relieve it of the duty to keep a lookout.[58] The fact that a train is approaching a crossing off the scheduled time imposes a duty of extra watchfulness on those in charge of it,[59] and, similarly, the failure to keep a lookout is to be considered in connection with the speed at which the train is running,[60] the amount and kind of travel over the crossing reasonably to be expected,[61] and the presence or absence of safeguards.[62]

The failure of those in charge of a train to keep a lookout of the kind and at the times required by law is negligence,[63] rendering a railroad liable for those injured by reason of such negligence,[64] if the breach of duty is the proximate cause of their injuries.[65]

§ 738. —— At What Crossings Required

a. In general
b. Private crossings
c. Crossings by custom
d. Crossings by invitation or license

a. In General

The liability of a railroad company to an individual with respect to its duty as to lights, signals, and lookouts at crossings is determined by the law applicable to the crossing at which he is injured, and where breach of a statutory duty is relied on, it must be shown that the crossing at which the injury occurred was one within the scope of the statute. The duty to give proper signals and warnings of approach, and to keep a proper lookout, usually exists in the case of an approach to a public crossing.

The liability of a railroad company to an individual with respect to its duty as to lights, signals, and lookouts at crossings is determined by the law applicable to the crossing at which he is injured,[66] and a failure to give the signals required for another crossing is ordinarily no breach of duty to one who is at a crossing for which no signals are required.[67] Where breach of a statutory duty is relied on, it must be shown that the crossing at which the injury occurred was one within the scope of the statute.[68]

Intent of statute

The statute making railroads liable for failure to keep constant lookout for persons and property on the tracks manifests intent to protect persons who unwittingly, although carelessly or negligently, or as trespassers, enter danger zones near tracks and particularly intersections or grade crossings.—Missouri Pac. In Tennessee

(1) Where a statute requires a signal by the engine driver only for crossings designated and marked by signs, and such statute undertakes to define the entire duty of railroads as to warnings at every grade crossing, the railroad has no common-law duty to give effective warning on approaching a crossing which is not properly designated and marked by signs.—Southern Ry. Co. v. Noah, 176 S.W.2d 826, 180 Tenn. 532.—52 C.J. p. 241 note 2 [c] (1).

(2) Nevertheless the common-law duty with respect to lookouts prevails at all crossings.—Whittaker v. Louisville, etc., R. Co., 179 S.W. 140, 132 Tenn. 576.

(3) Although under statute failure to give warning of train's approach to unmarked public grade crossing is not in itself negligence, if railway company commits other acts of common-law negligence, it may be under duty to give warning of approach to such unmarked crossing, since statute is not a license to railway company to commit other acts of common-law negligence.—Cincinnati, N.O. & T.P. Ry. Co. v. Garrett, 154 S.W.2d 435, 25 Tenn.App. 173.

(4) A warning must be given of the approach of a train to a public grade crossing, whether marked or unmarked, where such crossing is rendered extrahazardous by common-law acts of negligence on the part of a railway company other than failure to give warning by whistle and bell, notwithstanding the statute.—Cincinnati, N.O. & T.P. Ry. Co. v. Garrett, supra.

ings in cities or towns,[70] proper signals and warnings of approach must be given[71] and a proper lookout kept;[72] and a failure in this respect is negligence.[73] Some statutory provisions requiring certain precautions in the operation of trains and cars impose a duty on the railroad company only with respect to trains and cars moving toward public highway crossings of the kind designated.[74] Such provisions are generally held to apply not only to crossings of formally established public highways,[75] but also to all crossings which are public in fact,[76] as through dedication[77] or

Highway crossing

(1) A railroad crossing at point where a private dirt road formed extension of paved highway, the dirt road having been used by property owners and by the public generally for many years and railroad having constructed warning sign at crossing, was a "highway crossing" within meaning of statute requiring sounding of whistle and ringing of bell by locomotives at highway crossings.—Chesapeake & O Ry Co v. Pulliam, 41 S E 2d 54, 185 Va 908

(2) City street held "highway" within statutes requiring, and penalizing railroad's failure to give, signals at "highway" crossings, where city had ordinance enacted pursuant to statutory authority requiring signals—Norfolk & W Ry. Co v. White, 163 S E 530, 158 Va 243

Public highway

(1) Under the statute requiring sounding of bell or whistle when railroad engine is approaching any "highway" at grade, quoted word is used in the usual sense of a public way and does not include a private way—Stavola v. Palmer, 73 A 2d 331, 136 Conn. 670.

(2) Road which was entirely within railroad's right of way lines and which was used by farmers with permission of railroad in connection with depot was not "public highway" so as to render railroad company, whose train struck automobile at road crossing, negligent for failure to sound whistle—Langer v Chicago, M, St P & P. Ry Co, 265 N W 851, 220 Wis 571

Public way

If the public has right to use a way and exercises that right, even though it is neither dedicated as a highway nor maintained as such at public expense, it may be properly deemed a "public way" within statute requiring certain warning to be given at least a designated distance from place where railroad crosses public way.—Lemieux v Leonard Const. Co, 56 A 2d 189, 73 R I 338, reargument denied 58 A 2d 625, 73 R I. 338.

Held not a "public crossing"

Crossing leading to opening of private driveway located midway of block, there being no similar opening on opposite side of street, was not "public crossing" over railroad tracks in street within purview of statute requiring signals to be given by locomotives—Knight v Wabash Ry Co, Mo, 85 S W 2d 392

In Tennessee

(1) The statutes relating to railroads' duty to warn at grade crossings apply to every crossing whether such crossing be considered dangerous or otherwise—Southern Ry Co v. Noah, 176 S.W 2d 826, 180 Tenn 532

Acceptance

In order that a crossing may be a "public crossing" so as to require statutory warning signals by railroad, the road on which it is situated must be a public road established either in manner prescribed by statute or by dedication and if in the latter manner, there must be an acceptance.—Deitz' Adm'x v. Cincinnati, N. O & T. P. Ry. Co, supra.

No express dedication by the railroad is required if, by its conduct, it manifests a willingness to regard a crossing over its track as public prescription[78] Some provisions are broad enough to cover and include in their protection street crossings in incorporated towns and cities,[79] but other statutes have been held inapplicable to crossings within a municipality[80] or to crossings within an incorporated town or city[81] When a highway has been discontinued[82] and never reestablished,[83] there is no longer any duty to give statutory signals for a place where it crosses over a railroad track,[84] unless the discontinuance has been conditional and the condition is not yet complied with.[85]

At crossings over the tracks of a railroad company in its yards on its private premises there is no obligation to give the signals required at crossings generally,[86] even though such roads are constructed by the company and designed for ingress to, and egress from, its depot and premises,[87] but it must observe due care under the circumstances,[88] and a lookout statute requiring a constant lookout for persons on the track has been held to impose such a duty even as to trains being operated in the yards of the railroad company.[89] In approaching crossings just outside switch yards as a train departs therefrom, the statutory signals must be given[90] The statutory signals must be given, although the track on which a train is approaching a crossing is a side track.[91] The fact that gates or other local precautions to warn travelers have been installed at a crossing does not make it any less incumbent on a railroad to give the appropriate signals of approach and keep the proper lookout,[92] nor does the fact that another train is standing or running over a crossing on which there are two or more tracks.[93] The place where a railroad track runs at right angles across an alley which is not traveled or capable of being traveled except at one end, which travel does not cross the railroad, is not such a crossing as to require the giving of the signals required by statute.[94]

b. Private Crossings

Ordinarily no duty exists to give statutory signals at private crossings unless the statute expressly extends the duty to such crossings. Apart from statute, whether a duty exists to give signals at these crossings depends on the circumstances existing at the particular time, and the exercise of due care, under the existing surroundings and circumstances, may make necessary the giving of signals at such places

Ordinarily no duty exists to give statutory signals at private crossings,[95] but if the statute expressly extends the duty to all crossings, the rule is otherwise.[96] Apart from statute, whether a duty exists to give signals at private crossings depends on the circumstances existing at the particular time.[97] Ordinarily, at common law, no duty exists to give warning of the approach of trains to private crossings,[98] unless some unusual condition makes such action proper and necessary.[99] On the other hand, the exercise of due care, under the existing surroundings and circumstances, may make necessary the giving of some signals at such crossings,[1] and, if so, a failure to give warning of approach is negligence.[2] If at a private crossing people pass in such numbers that their presence should be anticipated[3] or the company is aware of such frequent user,[4] the company may have a duty to give warning of the approach of its trains or cars to crossings thus used, and if it has been customary for it to signal its approach to a crossing of this character[5] and the public relies on this being done,[6] reasonable[7] and customary[8] signals must be given.

Where a private crossing is so close to a public crossing that travelers on the former are accustomed to rely on the statutory warning being given for the latter, a failure to give the signals prescribed by statute for the public crossing is a breach of duty toward those on the private crossing.[9] On the other hand, a whistle given for a

Station whistle

(1) It has been held that station whistle which the railroad is accustomed to blow imposes on it no obligation to those using a nearby private crossing and no liability for omission of such signal—Annapolis, etc., R. Co. v. State, 65 A. 434, 104 Md. 659.

(2) It has also been held, however, that maintenance by railroad of post as a place for a station whistle cast on railroad duty of observing due care to sound whistle at such point, public crossing adjacent to a private crossing may suffice for the latter.[10] If such circumstances exist as to make a private crossing unusually hazardous, that may result in a duty to warn[11]

According to some decisions, a railroad company is required to maintain a lookout at private crossings,[12] but there is also authority to the contrary.[13]

c. Crossings by Custom

Ordinarily, the signals required by statute for public crossings need not be given at a crossing which is not public in fact, notwithstanding such crossing has been used by the public for a considerable time constantly and in large numbers, so that the presence of members of the public is to be anticipated at such place; but it is the duty of the railroad company at such places to give such signals of approach and keep such lookout as are necessary at common law.

Ordinarily, the signals required by statute for public crossings need not be given at a crossing which is not public in fact notwithstanding such crossing has been used by the public for a considerable time constantly in large numbers so that the presence of members of the public is to be anticipated at such place[14] Apart from statute, however, the railroad company may be required to take precautions to protect travelers at such crossings, particularly in cities and towns,[15] although its duty is not limited to crossings in cities and villages[16] Accordingly it is the duty of the railroad company at such places to give such signals of approach[17] and keep such lookout[18] as are necessary at common law, and a failure in one or the other of these duties is negligence.

d. Crossings by Invitation or License

At places where a railroad company has extended to the public an invitation to pass over its tracks, or where, by acquiescing in such a course of conduct, it has licensed its so doing, the company must give such warnings and signals of approach and keep such lookout as are requisite in the exercise of due care, although it need not observe at such places the requirements provided by statute for public crossings.

Obstructions to view

Under evidence that a private roadway took a sharp turn just before crossing the railroad track and in view of obstructions to view, duty of care by railroad at such a crossing with respect to giving signals of approach of train might be found to be the same as at a public highway crossing, which duty would require the railroad to give reasonable notice and warning of the approach of trains—Fischer v. Workmen Inducement and invitation extended by railroad, in setting up whistling posts and slow signs for guidance of its employees at point where new highway was being constructed across track, to workmen to cross track at such point carried with it correlative duty of railroad to give signals signs called for, and failure to do so constituted actionable negligence with respect to truck driver injured in crossing collision—Curtiss v. Co. v Beecher, C C A Minn, 150 F 2d 394, applying Iowa law, certiorari denied 66 S Ct. 339, 326 U.S. 781, 90 L.Ed. 473.

tions for the protection of travelers must be taken, and the company is not entitled to anticipate a clear track.[21] Accordingly, the railroad must give such warnings and signals of approach[22] and keep such lookout[23] as are requisite in the exercise of due care,[24] although it need not observe at such places the requirements provided by statute for public crossings.[25]

§ 739. —— Persons Entitled to Benefit of Signals and Lookouts

Statutes requiring a railroad company to give signals or other warnings when approaching crossings are for the protection of persons and property on, or passing over, crossings in order to afford notice of peril, and the failure to give warning or to keep a lookout for travelers affords no cause of action to those who are already aware of the presence and movement of the train.

Statutes requiring railroads to give signals or other warnings when approaching crossings are for the protection of persons and property on or passing over crossings,[26] and the object of requiring a railroad to give notice by signals or lights of the approach of its trains or cars to crossings is that those who are on or approaching such places may avoid peril by leaving them,[27] or by refraining from going on them.[28] So the failure to give warning affords no cause of action to those who are already aware of the presence and movement of the train,[29] and have all the warning which would be afforded by resort to such means,[30] as where the train obstructs the crossing at the time of the accident, as discussed supra § 734. In order, however, to absolve the railroad from negligence in failing to give signals on the ground that the injured person was aware of the approach of the train or should have known of the approach thereof by due care, it must appear that the injured person had actual or constructive notice in time to avoid injury.[31]

The required warning of approach of trains to crossings is due to those rightfully using or about to use such crossings as travelers[32] and not to others present there, as discussed infra § 910, but it is immaterial to those thus occupied that the crossing has been reached by walking along the track,[33] or that only a partial crossing is contemplated,[34] or that those in charge of the train

Licensees

The statute with respect to locomotive engineer's duty to ring bell and blow whistle is a public safety regulation enacted by legislature in exercise of police power and applicable to all persons within its scope, including licensees—Sharpe v Western Ry of Alabama, 175 So. 542, 234 Ala 507

are not aware of their intention to cross[35] It is not necessary that persons thus engaged have sufficient intelligence to understand the meaning and purpose of such signals[36] A breach of the duties owed by a railroad company to those possessed of a right to use a private crossing, discussed supra § 738 b, is not a violation of duty as to one using such a crossing without right[37]

The duty of keeping a lookout at crossings is an obligation due to travelers along the road using the crossing, who are on the track[38] or approaching it,[39] and to the property rightfully there belonging to such persons.[40] Damages cannot be recovered from a railroad because of its negligent failure to maintain a lookout, where the injured person knew or was bound to have known of the approach of the train causing the injury.[41]

Where a railroad blocks up a public crossing with its trains or cars, the travelers on the highway may continue their journey by going around in front of or behind the train,[42] and those traveling around by such extended crossing[43] or employing a nearby private crossing under such circumstances[44] are entitled to reasonable warning of the movements of trains and to have a reasonable lookout exercised for their safety[45]

§ 740. —— To What Trains or Cars Applicable

The application of statutes prescribing signals and warnings of approach and lookout duties has been held not to be determined solely by reference to motive power, but to be considered in connection with the substantive purpose and manner of operation of the road, and to extend to, and include, single cars operating under their own power

The application of statutes prescribing signals and warnings of approach and lookout duties has been held not to be determined solely by reference to motive power,[46] but to be considered in connection with the substantive purpose and manner of operation of the road,[47] and to extend to, and include, single cars operating under their own power.[48] On the other hand, some statutes requiring crossing signals and referring to "locomotive engines" and "steam whistles" have been held to refer only to motor engines generating and driver by steam power,[49] and, hence, inapplicable to electric railways[50] It has also been held that the statutes with respect to signals, lookouts, and other precautions do not apply to the operation of hand cars,[51] gasoline hand cars,[52] autospeeders,[53] or motorcars[54] approaching crossings along a railroad track, although there is also authority to the contrary as to the application of such statutes to motorcars.[55] In any event, the common-law obligations with respect to these matters do control the operation even of such cars[56] The law imposes no greater degree of care on operators of diesel engines than is required of operators of steam locomotives because of the difference in the amount of noise made by the whistle or horn[57]

A train of cars without an engine is not of such character as to be required to give the statutory signals by bell or whistle,[58] but a car or cars running thus must give reasonable warning of approach to a crossing.[59] Some statutory regulations with respect to maintaining a lookout ahead[60] and with respect to the giving of signals[61] have been held not to apply to trains or engines engaged in switching operations, but the operators of trains or engines so engaged may have the duty, apart from statute, to give reasonable warning of their approach to crossings,[62] and to keep a proper lookout and display proper lights.[63] Other statutes relating to signals have been held to apply to switching movements and not only to trains as made up as they pass from station to station[64]

Statutes requiring the locomotive to give certain signals of approach at a specified distance from a crossing apply only to trains running with the locomotive in front,[65] and others must signal when the nearest part of the train reaches the prescribed distance[66] A statute requiring a railroad to keep a "lookout ahead" on a locomotive is complied with only when a train is moving forward by means of an engine at its front.[67] An engine backing toward a string of cars left standing across a crossing with the purpose of coupling to them and with no purpose of crossing need not give the signals prescribed by statute of engines approaching crossings.[68] Through trains as well as local trains must observe the requirements of statutes providing that on approaching and leaving cities or towns signals shall be given within a certain distance of city limits[69]

An engine with its tender is a train within the meaning of statutes requiring signals and lookouts from trains,[70] and a tender is part of the engine under statutes requiring lookouts to be placed at the rear of backing engines[71] A train standing close to, or on, a crossing, when it starts up to move across should give proper signals[72] and a proper lookout should be maintained[73] A statute

§ 741. —— Obstructions of View and Hearing

a. In general
b. Atmospheric conditions

a. In General

The existence of obstructions to view or hearing is a circumstance bearing on the question whether a railroad company has performed its full duty as to lights and warnings and signals of approach, and as to keeping a lookout.

As a general rule the existence of obstructions to view or hearing is a circumstance bearing on the question whether a railroad company has performed its full duty as to lights and warnings and signals of approach,[75] and as to keeping a lookout,[76] particularly where the railroad company has itself caused or permitted the obstructions,[77] and this is true, although their construction may have been lawful and authorized[78] and although there may be no negligence in the fact of permitting them.[79] There is, however, authority to the effect that only where such obstructions have been caused or continued by a railroad company is it proper to consider them with respect to the precautions necessary to be exercised by the company,[80] but generally no such limitation is made.[81]

In accordance with the foregoing rule, in determining what precautions may be required of a railroad, regard is had to vegetation and other obstructions near the right of way at the crossing,[82] as well as to curves,[83] cuts,[84] embankments,[85] and buildings[86] of the railroad company on its right of way. Although there is authority holding that the mere temporary presence of a train or cars near a crossing is not such a circumstance as to impose any extra diligence with respect to warnings or signals of approach, on a railroad,[87] there are many decisions to the contrary,[88] and the presence of a car obstructing the view of the crossing may also affect the adequacy of the lookout maintained by the operators of the train causing the injury.[89] It has been held that in determining the adequacy of signals as a warning, obstructions to hearing only can be considered.[90]

b. Atmospheric Conditions

Atmospheric conditions prevailing at the time and place of the accident are treated by some decisions, although not by others, as proper for consideration in determining what constitutes reasonable warning of approach.

There is authority to the effect that in determining what constitutes reasonable warning of approach, atmospheric conditions prevailing at the time and place of the accident,[91] as for example, wind[92] and fog[93] shall not be considered, but these matters are treated in other decisions as proper for consideration[94] as is darkness.[95] It has been held that the fact that it is snowing and visibility is poor puts no more burden on the engine crew to maintain a lookout for a motorist approaching the crossing than it does on the occupants of the automobile.[96] The fact that a hard, blowing rain was falling and the alleged fact that, under the conditions of weather, the occupants of the vehicle colliding with the train could not have heard the train whistle or bell have been held to constitute no excuse for the failure of the operators of the train to perform the duty of giving a signal.[97]

§ 742. —— Effect of Compliance with Statutes or Ordinances

Statutes requiring lights or signals from trains or cars as a warning of their approach to a crossing express only the minimum of the duty of the railroad company, and there may be a duty under the circumstances to take other precautions than are required by the statute; but at an ordinary crossing and in the absence of any unusual circumstances, the doing of the acts prescribed by statute is sufficient.

Statutes requiring lights or signals from trains or cars as a warning of their approach to a crossing express only the minimum of the duty of a railroad company,[98] and a literal compliance therewith is not necessarily sufficient to show that the company has performed its full duty with respect to such precautions,[99] at least where there is nothing in the statute expressly providing that compliance therewith shall be sufficient to relieve the company from responsibility,[1] although there is some authority holding that compliance with the statute is all that is required except in certain unusual circumstances.[2] According to the generally prevailing rule, there may be a duty under the circumstances to give other and further notice than is required by the statute and to use other means to prevent accidents,[3] since the railroad is held to the exercise of due care to avoid injury to travelers;[4] and if such a duty is found to exist its breach is negligence.[5] At an ordinary crossing and in the absence of any unusual circumstances, however, the doing of the acts prescribed by statute is sufficient,[6] and, in any case, such conduct will re-

§ 743. —— Effect of Violations of Statutes or Ordinances

Generally, a failure to observe the requirements of statutes or ordinances concerning signals, warnings, and lookouts is negligence as a matter of law as to all those designed to be protected by such statute, and renders the railroad company liable for damages caused by such failure where the injured person is not guilty of contributory negligence.

As a general rule, a failure to observe the requirements of statutes[8] or ordinances[9] concerning signals and warnings is negligence as a matter of law as to all those designed to be protected by such statute,[10] and renders the railroad company liable for damages caused by such failure where the injured person is not guilty of contributory negligence.[11] Similarly, it is negligence per se to violate statutes or ordinances with respect to lookouts.[12] There is, however, authority to the effect that violation only constitutes evidence of negligence,[13] and likewise that it is prima facie evidence

Actionable
Negligence in failure to observe statutory duties to ring bell and blow whistle at street crossing must be actionable in order to render railroad liable for such injury.—Louisville & N. R Co. v. Davis, 181 So 695, 236 Ala. 191.

Liability irrespective of negligence
Under a statute imposing liability on railroads for failure to give certain signals at crossings, the failure to give such signal creates a liability against the railroad irrespective of negligence if the special defenses set out in the statute are not established —Mannino v. of negligence[14]

Violation of a crossing signal statute may be sufficient to warrant an inference of recklessness, willfulness, or wantonness[15] when taken in connection with other circumstances existing at the time of the injury,[16] as when the omission is willful[17] or is at any extraordinarily hazardous crossing,[18] although it cannot be so regarded when the omission is purely inadvertent[19] and the mere failure to give the statutory signals is not of itself recklessness or wantonness[20]

A statute which makes it a misdemeanor on the part of an engineer to fail to give certain prescribed signals imposes a duty on the company to give the warnings therein specified,[21] and its failure in this respect is negligence,[22] although there is other authority to the effect that such a statute imposes no duty on the railroad[23] even though omission of the signals therein prescribed may be evidence of a breach of the company's common-law obligation to give reasonable warnings of its approach to a crossing[24] A statute, imposing a fine on the railroad for failure to give certain required signals but a fine of such character that it is obviously inadequate to compel performance, is not a mere police regulation the penalty of which is exclusive, but it imposes a duty on the railroad to give such specified signals,[25] a breach of which is negligence per se,[26] and this is true especially when it is expressly provided that nothing in the statute shall take away any remedy from a person injured thereby[27]

§ 744. Rate of Speed

Under the common law no rate of speed consistent with safety of passengers and freight is negligence per se, but it is the duty of the railroad and its employees to run its trains with due regard to persons exercising ordinary care in traveling on the highway across its tracks, and what is a reasonable speed depends on the nature of the crossing and other circumstances of the case.

In the absence of statutory or municipal regulations a railroad company has the right to use its discretion in establishing the speed of its trains;[28] but the mere fact that there is no statutory limitation on the speed of trains through cities does not permit a negligent, excessive rate.[29] Generally no rate of speed consistent with the safety of passengers and freight is negligence per se.[30] However, under rate of speed without giving proper signals[33] or at a rate which renders the signals unavailing,[34] and the giving of signals does not justify an unreasonable rate of speed at a crossing.[35] Moreover, it has been held to be negligence for a train to approach a crossing at a rate of speed which the engineer knew would render it impossible to comply with statutory requirements.[36] Where the train was actually stopped before it reached the crossing, and a collision was avoided, it cannot be said that the train was operating at a negligent speed.[37]

Schedule; variance from usual speed or schedule. The fact that the train was being operated on its customary schedule does not alter its duty to pass a crossing at a reasonable rate of speed,[38] but the fact that a train was running later than schedule time does not require a reduction of speed.[39] Moreover, a railroad is not chargeable with negligence merely because it is operating a train faster than the usual or customary speed.[40]

Company rules and regulations. A railroad company rule as to the speed of certain trains, which does not relate merely to crossings, and which was not established for the purpose of protecting persons at crossings, does not render a speed in excess thereof negligence as to persons at a crossing.[41] Certainly, a speed of less than that permitted by company rules does not constitute evidence of defendant's negligence.[42] A railroad company regulation which requires a restricted speed within the limits of the railroad yard, but which fixes no maximum speed, does not establish that any particular speed is ex-

(1) In action against railroad for death of occupant of truck which was struck at extraordinarily hazardous crossing, what was excessive speed for trains was required to be determined by consideration of hazardous conditions existing at crossing.—Martin v. Yazoo & M. R. Co, La App, 181 So. 571.

(2) Where conditions surrounding and in proximity to a railroad crossing make it more hazardous than an ordinary crossing, it may be negligence for a train to travel over the crossing at its usual rate of speed.—Blaske v Northern Pac Ry. Co, 37 N.W.2d 758, 228 Minn. 444.

Failure to observe custom

Negligence may be predicated on failure to observe custom to slow down trains at particular crossing, but such claim of fault is presumably only one based on peculiar circumstances concerning a railroad crossing.—Markar v. New York, N H & H. R Co., C.C.A.Conn., 77 F. 2d 282.

cessive,[43] nor ordinarily does it establish that any particular crossing is dangerous, where no particular crossing influenced the adoption of the regulation.[44]

Alleged negligence in reducing and then increasing speed is immaterial in an action for damages for injuries sustained in a crossing accident where no one was misled thereby.[45]

§ 745. —— Nature and Locality of Crossings

Whether a railroad crossing is in a rural or an urban area is a circumstance to be considered with respect to reasonableness of speed; and, while apart from statute or ordinance no speed is negligence per se either in city or country, greater care is required at greatly traveled crossings in cities than at unfrequented ones in the country.

In determining whether the speed of a train is negligence, whether the crossing is within a city or town rather than rural area is a circumstance to be considered.[46] In the absence of statute, and under ordinary circumstances, a railroad company is not guilty of negligence per se in running a train at a high rate of speed at crossings in the country outside cities and villages,[47] or, although within the corporate limits, outside the settled portion of the town,[48] especially where the proper signals have been given,[49] or where the view is unobstructed,[50] or where both the proper signals for such crossings have been given and the view is unobstructed.[51] However, whether a particular speed at a particular country crossing is excessive depends on the surrounding circumstances,[52] and, when considered together with other circumstances existing at the time, it may be negligent for the company to run a train at a high rate of speed even at such a crossing.[53]

Likewise, in the absence of statute or ordinance, it is not negligence per se to run at a high rate of speed over crossings in a city or village,[54] at least if due and timely warning was given of the approach of the train.[55] However, a railroad must exercise greater care in the matter of speed at greatly traveled crossings in cities than at unfrequented crossings in the country;[56] and a rate of speed which would not be negligence at a crossing in the country may constitute negligence under the conditions existing at a crossing in a populous town or city,[57] and the question whether or not it is negligence depends on the circumstances at the particular time and crossing.[58]

It has been held that, in running through cities and towns, the speed of the train should be moderated to a reasonable degree, so as to have it under reasonable control,[59] and the same rule has been applied to a frequently used crossing outside the city limits.[60] This does not require, however, that the speed should be such as to enable those in charge of the train to stop it instantly,[61] but it is sufficient if the speed could be slackened in time to afford a traveler upon the highway an opportunity to make an effort to avoid a collision.[62]

Excessive speed held not excused The fact that a train was moving at its usual[63] or scheduled[64] rate of speed, or that a high rate would render it easier to ascend a grade just beyond,[65] does not excuse an excessive speed over crossings in a town or city.

Where gates have been erected and a flagman stationed at a crossing, the railroad company has the right to operate its trains over the crossing at any rate of speed, provided it uses due care in operating the appliances intended to shut off the public,[66] but where the watchman is off duty and the gates are open it is the duty of its employees to slacken speed.[67]

§ 746. —— Obstruction of View or Hearing

The fact that an obstruction or atmospheric conditions interfere with the ability to see or hear the highway or the train is a circumstance to be considered in determining whether the speed of the approaching train is negligent.

The fact that a crossing is or is not obstructed so as to interfere with the view of the highway or with the ability of travelers on the highway to see or hear the train approaching the crossing is a circumstance to be considered in determining whether the speed of the approaching train is negligent.[68]

Proportional diminution of speed
Where a railroad passes through a locality in the country where it is known that persons habitually use a private way maintained by the company in crossing its tracks and that persons are likely to be near such track, the speed of the train should be diminished in proportion to the probability of meeting persons on the tracks.—Wilson v. 68. U.S.—Mast v. Illinois Cent. R. Co., D.C.Iowa, 79 F.Supp. 149, affirmed, C.C.A., 176 F.2d 157.

Thus, while the fact that the view of the highway or of the train at a crossing is obstructed by intervening objects ordinarily does not make it negligence not to slacken speed at such crossing, where the required danger signals have been given,[69] running over it at a high rate of speed without giving sufficient warning signals is negligence.[70] Moreover, where the conditions at the time and crossing are otherwise such as, in the exercise of ordinary care, to require the railroad to slacken speed,[71] as where the crossing so obstructed is a much-used one,[72] the duty devolves on the company to run its trains over the crossing at a reasonable rate. In regulating the speed of its trains a company is not, however, bound to take into consideration objects not on its right of way or its own lands, even though they obstruct the view of its lines.[73] Whether the rate of speed at an obstructed crossing is negligent depends on all the circumstances;[74] and whether the company should slacken speed at a particular obstructed crossing depends on the circumstances.[75] It has been held that the railroad's negligence in operating a train at maximum speed at an obstructed crossing should be determined regardless of the average rate of speed on such run or the rate of speed at the place of collision.[76]

Atmospheric conditions. Whether a rate of speed during fog or rain is negligence depends on all the circumstances,[77] including the density of the population at the crossing.[78] Although there is some authority to the contrary,[79] where proper signals are given failure to check the speed of a train at a crossing because of fog[80] or rain[81] affecting visibility is not negligence, but where the direction of the wind makes it difficult for a traveler upon the highway to hear the noise of the train and its signals, and dust in the air tends to obscure his vision, it is the duty of the engineer to control the speed of the train accordingly.[82] is to govern the railroads in their conduct toward persons crossing the tracks[84] and to safeguard against injuries to persons and property.[85] Liability under such statutes has been said to depend on the lawfulness of the speed when the danger is, or should have been, discovered.[86]

b. Construction

(1) In general
(2) As to particular crossings
(3) As to particular engines and cars
(4) Persons and property protected

(1) In General

General rules apply in construing statutes or ordinances regulating the speed of engines or cars over crossings.

General rules as to the construction of statutes or municipal ordinances are applicable in construing statutes or ordinances regulating the speed of engines or cars over crossings,[87] and such enactments are to be interpreted in the light of other provisions on the same subject.[88] Where the statute requires speed to be checked on reaching a certain point, it is not necessary to begin checking the speed before reaching that point;[89] but under an ordinance limiting the speed on certain tracks to a specified rate a train must be brought within the limit by the time it reaches such track.[90]

(2) As to Particular Crossings

Statutes or ordinances prescribing the speed of trains at certain crossings or types of crossings or crossings in certain areas should be construed so as to give effect to the limiting provisions.

Statutes or ordinances prescribing the speed of trains at certain crossings or certain types of crossings or crossings in certain areas are to be construed so as to give effect to the limitations contained in the provisions.[91] Thus, where a statute or ordinance prescribes a speed limit in a certain area, it has no application to persons or property situated outside such area,[92] even though the train itself is partly within such area.[93] A statute or ordinance prescribing the speed of trains through[94] or in[95] streets applies only to streets upon and through which the track is located, and not to a simple street crossing.[96] Where the speed is limited until gates and signal bells are erected and put into operation, the limit ceases to be in force when such appliances are put into use,[97] and it is not revived by subsequent failure to operate them.[98] Although there is some authority to the contrary,[99] where an ordinance designates certain streets as boundaries of the area in which speed is to be limited, crossings at the designated streets are construed to be within the area;[1] and, where a municipal ordinance limits speed over any public place or at any place between certain streets, the limit applies to a public crossing in the city although it is not within the designated area.[2] Requirements as to speed at crossings apply only to grade crossings,[3] particularly where they expressly so state;[4] and a law requiring the checking of trains at road crossings applies as well to crossings of streets in cities.[5] A statute making a railroad company liable for injuries caused by a rate of speed exceeding a designated rate within a municipality does not apply to injuries inflicted outside the municipal limits[6] even though the speed could not be reduced to such rate before reaching such limits[7] A statute limiting speed over crossings "near the compact part of a town" applies to any compact portion, and not necessarily the largest or principal compact part of a town[8]

Curves. Under a statute so providing, the requirement to slow down applies only to crossings on curves of certain specifications[9]

Origin of crossing on highway Persons crossing the track at a public road crossing are entitled to the protection of statutes regulating the approach of locomotives and cars to the crossing, no matter how the road or crossing came into existence[10] Thus, a requirement that trains shall not exceed a certain speed until "they have passed all traveled streets of a city" applies to all actually traveled streets within the city limits, although such only by user;[11] and a "highway," within the meaning of such regulatory statutes, is not limited to ways established by county commissioners or municipal authorities,[12] the term being used in its more generic and popular legal sense.[13]

(3) As to Particular Engines and Cars

Effect should be given statutes or ordinances prescribing the speed of certain trains or trains under certain conditions.

Effect should be given to statutes or ordinances prescribing the speed of certain trains or trains under certain conditions or circumstances[14] Thus, a statute prescribing speed limits for trains running "into or through" a station does not apply to a train running past the station without going into or through it.[15] While an engine and tender are not within the meaning of a law or ordinance limiting the speed of "passenger trains,"[16] where an ordinance by its terms applies to "any through or local freight train or passenger train," an engine and tender of a freight train proceeding to reconnect with the train after switching some cars is within its provisions.[17] Where an ordinance limits the speed of cars operated over street railway tracks, it does not apply to cars when operated over railroad tracks upon a private right of way,[18] even though they are local cars operated only within the city limits and running for the greater part of their course over city streets.[19]

Train started at crossing. A statute requiring the checking of speed of trains at public crossings does not apply to a train started at or upon a crossing.[20]

(4) Persons and Property Protected

Every person who would be benefited by compliance by the railroad company with a valid statute or ordinance is entitled to the protection which obedience thereto would furnish.

Every person who would be benefited by a compliance by the railroad company with a valid statute or ordinance is entitled to the protection which obedience to such ordinance would furnish,[21] whether or not he is an inhabitant of the city,[22] whether or not he knew or relied on such regulation,[23] and even though the ordinance is a franchise ordinance.[24] So a statute relating to the speed of engines and cars in depots and providing for recovery of full damages by one injured as a result of violations thereof is not confined to passengers and those intending to take passage,[25] and it covers injuries to property as well as to the person[26] A statute requiring trains at railroad crossings to come to a full stop and move forward slowly, however, imposes no duty on the company as to a person at a highway crossing near a railroad crossing.[27]

§ 748. —— Effect of Statutes or Ordinances

Statutes or ordinances regulating the speed of trains do not change the general law as to speed; and, while compliance with regulations ordinarily will negative negligence, a rate of speed may under some circumstances be negligent at common law even though within the regulations.

Statutes or ordinances regulating the speed of trains do not change the general law on the subject,[28] or the rights and duties of the parties growing out of obedience or disobedience to such a statute or ordinance;[29] and employees operating trains must use ordinary care and conform their rate of speed to the safety of the public, according to the circumstances of each case, and irrespective of statute or ordinance.[30] Accordingly, while compliance with the requirements of a statute or ordinance as to speed ordinarily will be sufficient to negative negligence,[31] it is also true that, since a rate of speed may be negligent at common law while within the statutory speed limit,[32] where the circumstances at a particular time and crossing are such that ordinary care and prudence require trains to be run at a less rate of speed than that limited by the statute or ordinance, the railroad company is bound to exercise such care and prudence,[33] it being a question of fact to be determined by the circumstances whether the speed fixed by such statute or ordinance is consistent with due caution.[34]

§ 749. —— Violation of Statutes or Ordinances

The running of a train at a crossing at a speed in excess of that limited by statute or ordinance is usually negligence per se.

Where a train is run at a crossing at a rate of speed in excess of that limited by statute or ordinance, it is in most jurisdictions negligence per se,[35] for which the railroad company is liable if such speed is the proximate cause of the injury, as discussed infra § 761, and there is no contributory negligence on the part of the person injured.[36] Moreover, this liability exists even though there was no actual collision,[37] and notwithstanding such statute or ordinance has never been enforced,[38] and was customarily violated,[39] or the engineer or other person in charge of the train did all in his power to stop the train after discovering the danger of the person injured.[40] In some jurisdictions, however, an unlawful rate of speed at a crossing is held to be merely evidence of negligence to be considered by the jury together with other circumstances on the question of negligence,[41] although under some circumstances it may become negligence per se.[42]

Duty must be owing to injured person. The general rule that in order that the violation of a statute or ordinance may constitute negligence it is necessary that the duty created thereby should have been for the benefit of, or should have been owed to, the person claiming to have been injured through its violation, discussed in Negligence § 19 e (4) (a), has been applied to statutes or ordinances regulating the speed of trains.[43]

Injury by suction. Where a person is injured by being sucked under a train by the current of air put in motion by a train while running at a rate of speed prohibited by ordinance, the company cannot be held liable unless it is shown that it knew that such excessive speed would produce such a result or that a reasonably prudent man would have apprehended it.[44]

§ 750. Means of Controlling Trains

It is generally the duty of a railroad company to adopt well tested brakes or other appliances for the control of its trains.

It is the duty of a railroad company to adopt well tested brakes or other appliances for the control of its trains,[45] and it is liable for injuries caused, without any fault on the part of the person injured, by reason of its failure to supply or keep in repair such brakes or appliances,[46] and to have an employee on hand to apply them[47] at the proper time.[48]

Under the Federal Safety Appliance Act, the duty of an interstate railroad with respect to power control brakes applies to travelers at highway crossings,[49] and is not limited to travelers on the railroad and railroad employees,[50] whose protection was the primary purpose of the act;[51] and the statute converts the railroad's common-law duty to maintain adequate brakes from a qualified duty into an absolute one,[52] from the violation of which there arises a liability for an injury resulting therefrom to any person falling within the terms and intent of the act.[53] However, the statute, and the rules of interstate commerce commission pursuant thereto, have been held not to apply to ordinary switching operations in railroad yards.[54] Moreover, statutory provisions which are held to have no application to the safety of the general public are not controlling in actions for injuries at crossings resulting from failure to maintain required safety appliances.[55]

§ 751. Precautions as to Persons or Objects Seen at or near Crossings

a. In general
b. Duty to stop or reduce speed

a. In General

Train operatives are under no duty to take action for the safety of a person at or near a crossing except where such person is in imminent peril, which is or should have been appreciated by them, in which case they must use all reasonable precautions and efforts to avert an accident.

The requirement of care on the part of a railroad company as to crossings is to be determined by considering what the engineer would be justified in counting on from travelers on the highway approaching a crossing.[56] Thus, other than the general duty to operate trains with ordinary care when approaching a crossing, discussed supra § 732, railroad employees not reasonably anticipating that a person will come upon a crossing owe no particular duty of care to him;[57] and there is no duty to take action for the safety of a person at or near a cross-

Contributory negligence in crossing near approaching train see infra § 799

Duty to blow horn or whistle
(1) Mere fact that automobile is approaching city railroad grade crossing does not of itself require engineer on train approaching crossing to blow its whistle.—Keegan v. Chicago, M., St. P. & P. Ry. Co., 27 N.W.2d 739, 251 Wis. 7.

(2) Engineer of gas-electric train seeing men on truck crossing private grade crossing waving as though to attract somebody's attention and having a view of roadway for nearly one hundred feet owed no duty of care to motorist some distance behind truck beyond blowing horn to give notice of approach of train.—Rideout v. Boston & M. R. R., 30 A.2d 488, 92 N.H. 340.

ing until the peril is appreciated or is so obvious that it would be assumed to have been appreciated [58] However, where an engineer or other employee in charge of a train sees a person in a position of imminent peril upon or near a crossing, it is his duty, although such person is not actually upon the track,[59] to use all reasonable precautions and efforts to prevent a collision or otherwise to avert an accident;[60] and if he fails to do so the railroad company is liable for the resulting injuries.[61]

The company is not guilty of negligence, however, because such employee fails to exercise the best judgment possible when confronted with a sudden contingency,[62] or fails to provide against unusual or unexpected contingencies,[63] or does not at all hazards use all the means at his command to prevent a collision;[64] and if on discovering a person in peril at a crossing the engineer or other employee uses all reasonable precautions and efforts to avert an accident, such as by giving the alarm and applying the brakes, he performs his whole duty, and although such efforts are unavailing there is no liability on the part of the railroad company [65]

b. Duty to Stop or Reduce Speed

A train operative may presume that a person on or approaching a crossing is in possession of his natural faculties, aware of the situation, will exercise care for his own safety, and will remove to or remain in a place of safety; and he need not stop or check the train until he knows or should know that the person apparently will not get or stay out of danger.

Except in so far as the rule may be affected by statutory provisions,[66] and unless and until the con-

Circumstance not reasonably to be anticipated

Automobile apparently stopping

Where trainmen, if they had been looking, would have seen automobile in which plaintiff was riding approaching a crossing at such speed as to indicate driver's intention to stop and knowing that from a certain distance from crossing the driver had an unobstructed view of track and that at such time train was in plain sight, for a time after trainmen should have seen automobile they would have had the right to assume that driver would stop or drive off the road and not get upon crossing—Meyette v Canadian Pac Ry Co, 6 A 2d 33, 110 Vt 345.

Duty to signal

A railroad engineer or fireman may be negligent for failing to sound or to call for a warning whistle after discovering a traveler in a dangerous situation on a grade crossing.—Craig v. Boston & Maine R. R, 32 A.2d 316, 92 N.H. 408—52 C.J. p 252 note 14 [a].

Fireman's shout to stop held sufficient

Where fireman discovered that automobile approaching crossing was not going to stop and shouted to engineer to stop, railroad was held not negligent so as to be liable for death of automobile occupants because fireman did not shout to engineer to sound whistle—Chesapeake & O Ry Co v Harrell's Adm'r, 81 S W 2d 10, 258 Ky 650

trary becomes evident,[67] an engineer or other employee in charge of a train ordinarily has the right to presume that a person on or approaching a crossing is in possession of his natural facilities,[68] that he is aware of the situation,[69] that he will exercise ordinary care and take the precautions which the law requires him to take to insure his own safety,[70] that the vehicle he is riding in is under control and in good repair,[71] and that he will remove to, or remain in, a place of safety.[72] Accordingly, the

(1) If passengers in truck did not know that train was approaching, and enginemen had good cause to realize such fact, fireman had no right to assume that truck would wait for train to pass at crossing.—Smith v. Thompson, 142 S.W.2d 70, 346 Mo. 502

(2) When there is something about motorist's actions, conduct, or movement of his vehicle which is indicative of fact that he is oblivious to his peril or for any reason cannot or will not stop before coming upon track, engineer of train does not have right to assume that motorist will act for his own protection.—Neill v. Alton R. Co., Mo.App., 113 S.W.2d 1073.

View of moving car obscured

Engineer could not indulge assumption that motorist saw and heard approaching train and would stop before reaching track after locomotive entirely obscured engineer's view of automobile which was still moving forward toward crossing when engineer last saw it.—Alabama Great Southern R. Co. v. Bolton, 7 So. 2d 296, 242 Ala. 562.

Automobile partly in ditch

Where one of the front wheels of an automobile was in a ditch, and the back end of the automobile was over a rail, and automobile looked as if it would turn over, engineer of locomotive, approaching automobile, had no right to assume that it would move either out of danger, or backward into danger.—Grotjan v. Stalled car

(1) Railroad engineer had right to assume up to very moment of collision that driver of truck stalled upon crossing could and would extricate himself from danger.

N C.—Temple v Hawkins, 16 S.E 2d 400, 220 N.C 26

Tex.—Beatty v. Thompson, Civ App, 176 S W 2d 795, error refused.

(2) Railroad engineer could presume that automobile crossing track quarter of a mile ahead would clear track before train reached crossing, and was not required to presume that automobile would stall, that driver would remain in automobile after it stalled, or that doors were in such condition that driver could not readily get out.—Truett v Atlantic Coast Line R Co, 33 S E 2d 396, 206 S C. 144

Assumptions with respect to children

(1) The rule stated in the text has been applied even to infants.—Ingle v Clinchfield R Co, 192 S E 782, 169 Va 131

(2) But it has also been held that operators of train were not entitled to assume that child would stop before reaching danger zone to same extent that they could properly do in case of adult, for lack of judgment natural to so young a child must be considered.—Cote v. Palmer, 16 A 2d 595, 127 Conn 321.

(3) Likewise, engineer has no right, at least in absence of warning signal of approaching train to assume that child of tender years, even though he has seen train, will act with discretion of adult in remaining in place of safety unless it is apparently of sufficient age and intelligence to understand danger of its position.—West v Southern Ry Co, 100 S W.2d 1004, 20 Tenn App 491

In Arkansas

(1) It is generally held that the trainmen may assume that a car or person approaching the track will stop before reaching a position of danger.—Kansas City Southern Ry Co v. Mickel, 183 S W 2d 45, 207 Ark 872—Missouri Pac R Co. v Doyle, 160 S W 2d 856, 203 Ark 1111—Crossett Lumber Co v. Cater, 141 S W.2d 1074, 201 Ark 432—Missouri Pac R Co v Davis, 125 S W.2d 785, 197 Ark 830.

(2) Where those in control of slow-moving locomotive see an automobile or other vehicle approaching a crossing and manner of approach in respect of speed and control is such that in view of attending physical conditions a normal person could and a reasonably prudent person would see the train and stop, responsibility for accident will not be shifted to railroad.—Crossett Lumber Co v Cater, supra

(3) However, it has also been held that, if railroad engineer saw motorist slowly approaching railroad crossing in city in time to avoid injury, engineer was required to stop train or reduce its speed without regard to the lookout statute, unless there was something to indicate that the motorist intended to stop.—Missouri Pac. R Co v Huffman, 108 S. W.2d 479, 194 Ark. 456.

train[73] unless the conduct of those in charge thereof induces one approaching the crossing to believe that the train will not proceed to the crossing or that those in charge will yield the right of way[74] or unless they have failed to give proper crossing signals.[75]

Where the engineer or other employee knows or has reason to apprehend that a person on or approaching a crossing apparently will not get or stay out of danger, it is his duty to use all reasonable efforts, consistent with the safety of the train and the persons thereon,[76] to slacken its speed, and, if possible, to stop it in time, in order to avert an accident,[77] particularly where he knows or has reason to apprehend that the person on or approaching the crossing is not in possession of ordinary ability to care for himself,[78] as that he is infirm or helpless[79]

or is a child of tender years;[80] and if he fails to do so the company is liable for the resulting damages.[81] He is not, however, required to stop the train in the shortest time possible after discovery of the peril;[82] and, where it is impossible to do so, failure to stop before striking a traveler upon the highway is not negligence.[83]

Objects seen on or near track. It has been held that an engineer is not required, every time he sees an object on or near the track, to stop for fear that it may be a person;[84] but if by the exercise of reasonable care he could have discovered such to be the fact in time to have stopped the train failure to do so is negligence for which the company is liable;[85] and where the engineer sees an automobile standing on the tracks he cannot proceed as though the way were clear until he is able to ascertain whether or not there is a human being in the automobile.[86] Moreover, it has been held to be the common-law duty of railroad trainmen, on the appearance of an obstruction on the track, to use their utmost endeavors to prevent a collision.[87] Under or without reference to a statute so providing, it is the duty of an engineer on perceiving any obstruction on the track to use all the means within his power known to skillful engineers to bring the train to a stop.[88]

Under Tennessee statute

(1) Under Tennessee statute to that effect, when any obstruction appears on the road, that is, in front of the train or so near thereto that it will be struck by the train, the alarm whistle must be sounded, the brakes put down, and every possible means employed to stop the train and prevent an accident, and the failure to observe such precautions results in absolute liability on the part of the railroad

(3) The statute is merely declaratory of the common law with the exception that contributory negligence of the injured party, where the statute is violated, does not bar a recovery and the burden of proof is on the railroad company to show that it has complied with the statutory precautions.—Louisville & N R. (8) However, the statutory duties do not arise until the obstruction, such as an automobile, appears on the road, either in front of or within striking distance of the train, and until then the duty of the trainmen is determined by the common law

§ 752. Frightening Animals

Generally, where the failure to give the usual or statutory signals results in a horse or horses becoming frightened at the approaching or passing train, and causing injury, the railroad company is guilty of negligence and is liable for such injury.

It is generally held that where a railroad company employee fails to give the usual or statutory signals as a train approaches a crossing, and as a result thereof a horse or horses are frightened by the approaching or passing train and cause injury without any fault on the part of the person injured, the company is guilty of negligence and is liable for such injury,[89] but there is also authority to the contrary.[90] The majority rule is based on recognition of a duty imposed by such statutes to protect those near such crossings from fright as well as those on them from collision,[91] and those who are not within the protection of this duty, for example, persons at private crossings,[92] and persons who have crossed over the railroad and gone some distance beyond at the time when the train arrives at the crossing,[93] cannot recover for injuries from animals frightened as a result of the omission of the required signals. A statute making the railroad liable for damages from collision at a crossing if the required signals are not given restricts the duty of protection by such signals and the right of recovery for their omission to those whose damages spring from collision,[94] and does not include those whose injuries are the result of the fright of passing teams,[95] nor is the railroad liable, even though it omitted to give the proper signals, where the driver saw the train and was aware of its approach as soon as he would have been had the proper signals been given.[96]

A railroad company is liable for injury arising from the fright of horses or other animals at crossings occasioned by negligence in giving signals or permitting steam to escape, as discussed infra § 754, or its negligence in obstructing the highway and permitting cars or objects emitting offensive odors to remain near a highway crossing, infra § 755, or its negligence in the operation of trains, generally, infra § 753. The liability of a railroad for injuries occasioned by frightening animals near the tracks in general is discussed infra § 989; and the liability of a railroad for injuries to animals supra §§ 547–689

§ 753. —— Liability in General

A railroad company is not liable for injuries occasioned by animals taking fright at the ordinary movements, noise, or appearance of trains or cars, or other noises incident to the operation of the railroad, and this is usually likewise true at intersections of highways and railroads other than grade crossings.

The authority of a railroad company to operate a railroad includes the right to make any noise necessarily incident to the operation of its road and the movement and working of its engines;[97] and it is therefore not liable for injuries occasioned at crossings by horses taking fright at the ordinary movements, noise, or appearance of trains or cars,[98] or at other noises incident to the operation of its road.[99] However, except where the person injured

The negligent omission to whistle or ring a bell when approaching a crossing as required by statute did not render the company liable to a farmer who was plowing his field near the crossing and who was injured because his horses were frightened by the train, since the statutory requirement was intended only for the benefit of travelers on the highway.—Williams v Chicago, etc, R Co, 26 N E. 661, 135 Ill 491, 25 Am S.R. 397, 11 L R A. 352.

is by his own fault prevented from recovering,[1] if, in operating a train or conducting the business of a railroad its employees act improperly without regard for the rights of others, the railroad is liable for injuries occasioned by frightened horses,[2] either by the creation of unnecessary and unusual or extraordinary noises or conditions not reasonably and usually connected with the operation of railroads,[3] or by conducting such business in a manner ordinarily usual and proper but under circumstances such that the railroad employees have reason to apprehend injury therefrom and fail to use due care to prevent it[4] or such that they are otherwise negligent in the operation of the road.[5] No recovery can be had for mere fright of animals or their drivers unaccompanied by physical injury.[6]

Handcars. The above rules are applicable to the operation of handcars by employees of a railroad.[7] Thus the railroad ordinarily is not liable for fright occasioned by the mere appearance of handcars or ordinary sounds arising from their use,[8] and in the absence of statute no rate of speed is per se negligent,[9] nor is a failure to give signals of their approach,[10] so that a railroad will not be liable for fright and injury caused thereby.[11] However, negligent operation of a handcar, such as starting it near or moving it toward one who has entered on a crossing when the handcar is standing still and the operators are aware of the fact,[12] or continuing to run a handcar toward a crossing by an operator after he is aware that a team at that point is becoming frightened,[13] or failing to signal or to slacken speed where the company maintains an obstruction near the crossing in a manner which conceals the ordinary approach of such a vehicle[14] may render the railroad liable for injuries occasioned by animals frightened at the handcar.

Intersections of highway and railway other than grade crossings The ordinary sounds and noises of moving trains or the ordinary escape of smoke, produced in the operation of railroads, which frighten horses passing along the highway at or near a point where a railroad crosses over a highway on a bridge or trestle or passes under a highway bridge, do not of themselves constitute actionable negligence making the railroad liable for injuries occasioned by such fright,[15] but if, on all the facts, the company has failed to use due care toward those passing over or under its tracks with horses, it is liable for injuries occasioned by their fright[16] It is not sufficient proof of negligence to show that noises or smoke were unnecessary,[17] or that the employees of the railroad could have seen the approaching horses in time to have discontinued the noises,[18] although it has also been held that the fact of their presence in the vicinity of the crossing need not be known to the employees in order to charge the company with liability.[19]

Blowing a whistle at or near a place where a railroad crosses a highway upon or under a bridge is not of itself negligence,[20] even though blown at a place of extraordinary danger,[21] and if the blowing of a whistle at a bridge over or under a road is necessary, the railroad is not liable for having thus acted.[22] The unnecessary blowing of a whistle under a bridge constitutes negligence,[23] but if at the time and under the circumstances it appears necessary to the engineer to blow the whistle it is not negligence to do so,[24] and whether or not it is negligence depends on all the facts and circumstances existing at the time of the act and relating to it.[25] The burden is on the person injured to show that the blowing of the whistle at such a place and at the time it was blown was unnecessary,[26] but there is also authority to the contrary, at least as to whistling done underneath a highway crossing, holding that the mere act of blowing in such a place justifies an inference of negligence.[27] The act of blowing a whistle under a bridge in a manner calculated to frighten horses when a horse is known to be traveling overhead renders the railroad liable for injuries occasioned by the fright of the horse at the whistle.[28]

Failure to give a signal or warning on approaching the bridge and at that distance from it at which statutes require that a signal shall be given on approaching highway crossings does not render the railroad liable for fright of horses and resulting injury caused by a failure to do so,[29] since the duty of the railroad company in this respect is analogous to that toward those traveling on parallel highways rather than toward those at grade crossings;[30] but in at least one jurisdiction the jury may find negligence from a failure to signal.[31]

§ 754. —— By Signals and Escape of Steam

In general, a railroad company is not responsible for injuries occasioned by horses becoming frightened by the sounding of whistles or other signals, or the escape of steam from its engines, unless it is done wrongfully and improperly.

The usual and proper sounding of whistles or other signals[32] or the proper escape of steam from its engines[33] is not negligence and does not make the railroad company responsible for injuries occasioned by horses becoming frightened thereat. However, where the employees wrongfully and improperly blow the whistle,[34] or cause or allow steam to escape,[35] thereby causing horses to become frightened, the railroad company is responsible for the resulting injury; and this is especially true where the acts are done in violation of statute[36] or ordinance.[37] The act in letting off steam or blowing a whistle or giving other signals is improper if it is unnecessary[38] and is done without regard to the safety of those passing to or over its crossings after its servants are aware of their proximity and the fright of their animals,[39] or after they should, in the exercise of due care, be aware of such facts.[40]

Automatic discharge of steam. The discharge of steam from the automatic steam valve of an engine standing in a lawful and proper place, over which steam valve the railroad employees in charge of the train have no control, cannot be treated as improper or negligent;[41] but if they can control and regulate its operation the railroad is liable for harm occasioned by their negligent omission to do so,[42] although if to regulate it would seriously hamper and impair the operation of the railroad failure to do so is not negligence.[43]

Signals required by statute. As a general rule the blowing of whistles and giving of other signals required by statute whereby horses are frightened and injury is caused is not negligence for which the railroad company is responsible[44] unless they are given negligently or wantonly.[45] However, even the giving of the statutory signals may constitute negligence if the railroad employees see that animals will be frightened and can desist from giving them consistently with their duty,[46] but only in the absence of facts tending to show that injury to others at the crossing might result.[47] Whenever the train has reached a point where the law requires signals to be given and it is uncertain whether the train can be stopped before reaching the crossing, the signals must be given in spite of the known presence of animals.[48]

§ 755. —— By Obstructions or Odors on or near Tracks

A railroad company is liable for injuries arising from the fright of horses or other animals occasioned by its negligence in placing or leaving cars, trains, or other objects at a crossing, including cars or objects emitting noxious odors.

The rule that one who negligently or without right places an object naturally calculated to frighten horses of ordinary gentleness within the limits of a public highway may become liable for injuries arising from the fright of horses occasioned by his act in so placing them, discussed in Highways § 259, applies to railroad companies,[49] and the negligent placing or leaving of cars, trains, or other objects at the crossing of a railway track and a public highway so as to extend upon, and occupy part of, the latter and affect horses, renders the company answerable for resultant damage.[50] As to what is negligence on the part of the company there is authority to the effect that the mere position of the cars at such a point is sufficient,[51] and likewise to the effect that such conduct in itself is evidence of negligence,[52] and the mere occupancy of a crossing by cars or engines of a railroad is prima facie unlawful and must be explained by the company.[53] However, it is usually material evidence in establishing the existence of negligence that the objects complained of were placed at the crossing unnecessarily,[54] and were of a character and in a position reasonably calculated to frighten ordinarily gentle animals,[55] and were left on the highway at the crossing for an unreasonable length of time,[56] and whether a sufficient showing has been made to demonstrate that these conditions existed is a question of fact to be considered with all the surrounding circumstances.[57]

The courts have quite generally refused to hold as a matter of law that the ordinary trains and equipment of a railroad company are nuisances calculated to frighten ordinarily gentle horses,[58] although it has been so held under some circumstances.[59] It has been held that an allegation must be made that the character and location of the objects were reasonably calculated to frighten an ordinarily gentle horse in order to make out a cause of action,[60] but there is also authority to the contrary.[61] If the obstruction under all the circumstances was calculated to frighten a reasonably gentle horse, the fact that the horse which was frightened thereby was not of that kind but was a spirited animal will not relieve the railroad of liability,[62] but the driver, if not himself negligent, can still recover.[63]

Reasonable duration. In determining whether the object has been allowed to stand on the crossing for more than a reasonable time, limitations in statutes and ordinances of the length of time that trains may remain on crossings have been resorted to, any further period being held to be unreasonable[64] and any shorter period reasonable,[65] and there is authority that the mere fact of remaining thus in excess of such designated period is sufficient to show negligence.[66] On the other hand, violation of such a statute has been said to be evidence of negligence only.[67]

Necessity. In determining whether the obstruction was necessary, it is no defense to the railroad company to show that it had no other grounds or switch tracks available on which to place the cars which caused the fright,[68] and, conversely, a showing that there were at the time other premises available is not conclusive that there was no necessity for the placing of the cars or equipment on the crossing.[69]

Place of location. The public right is not limited to the traveled part of the highway at the crossing,[70] and an object placed by a railroad company at any point whatsoever within the limits of the highway may be an obstruction for which it is liable.[71] A distinction is recognized between the liability of a railroad for fright occasioned by objects on the highway and that occasioned by those near but not on it,[72] since the company has a right to place and leave its cars on tracks or private grounds for any length of time[73] and is liable only for negligence in doing so.[74]

Private crossings. The responsibility of a railroad is not any different for leaving objects calculated to frighten horses on or near private crossings than with respect to public crossings,[75] except that, where the railroad maintains the crossing and permits the public to use it, the company is free from liability for obstruction at any portions of it other than the traveled part.[76]

Bridge crossing. A railroad is liable for injuries from fright occasioned by obstructions on a highway bridge crossing its track under circumstances such as would impose liability if a grade crossing were involved.[77]

Act of third person. The liability of a railroad for injuries from animals taking fright at objects on or near the highway does not extend to situations where the object is thus placed by third persons not under its control or direction[78] unless they did so at the suggestion and with the knowledge of its employees,[79] nor does such liability extend to other situations where the object is placed there without fault on the part of the railroad company.[80] However, the railroad company is liable when, in either of the above situations, it has allowed the terrifying object to remain for an unreasonable length of time[81] after it knows or should, in discharging its duties, know of its presence on or near the tracks.[82]

Offensive odors. Independently of statute, a railroad is liable for leaving its cars so near a crossing as to frighten passing animals by noxious odors if such conduct is negligent,[83] or for permitting a carcass to remain upon its right of way and emit offensive odors near a highway when such odors cause fright and injury.[84]

company are guilty of wantonness or willfulness in inflicting an injury at a railroad crossing,[85] or, in some instances, "gross negligence,"[86] the railroad company is liable therefor, notwithstanding contributory negligence on the part of the person injured.[87] In order to constitute willfulness or wantonness the railroad employees must have done the negligent acts with the knowledge and consciousness that injury would probably result;[88] and a formed intent to injure or kill is not essential.[89]

Whether or not the conduct of a company's servants in a particular case amounts to willfulness or wantonness[90] or "gross negligence"[91] depends on the circumstances of the case. Thus the injury may be wantonly or willfully inflicted by running a train at a high or unlawful rate of speed and without giving the proper signals, when approaching a crossing over a much traveled street or highway, and where the view is obstructed[92] and the engineer saw or might have seen the person injured, and prevented the injury,[93] or by sending cars across a public crossing, under no control, and without precautions or warnings,[94] or by unnecessarily blowing the whistle, when it is apparent to those in charge of the engine that horses at the crossing will become frightened thereat.[95] However, mere knowledge of the proximity of a team is not conclusive evidence of willfulness in blowing the whistle, notwithstanding the whistling is needless.[96]

An injury is not deemed wantonly or willfully inflicted by the mere fact that the company's servants did not exercise such care as very prudent men take of their own concerns,[97] or that the railroad was violating a statute or ordinance,[98] or that the train which inflicted the injury was being run in violation of a statute or ordinance,[99] as at an

Where guest in automobile which was ditched to avoid collision with a standing train which was blocking the crossing at night, was guilty of no more than simple negligence in failing to observe the crossing or to pay attention to the operation of the automobile, such negligence would not bar a recovery against the railroad if it was guilty of wilfulness and wantonness in blocking the crossing.—Crapse v. unlawful rate of speed[1] or without giving the proper signals,[2] or that the train approached and passed a public crossing at a high[3] or excessive[4] rate of speed, without ringing the bell or sounding the whistle.[5] Moreover, the starting of a standing train while a person is attempting to climb between the cars is not itself wantonness or willfulness[6] unless the employees of the railroad company have notice at the time that he is in a position where such movement of the cars will be very dangerous[7]

b. Unauthorized Acts

A railroad company is liable for injury resulting from the act or omission of an employee, even though such act or omission is unauthorized, provided it is is within the general scope of his employment; and under certain conditions it may even be liable for the negligence of one not its employee.

Where an act or omission of a railroad employee which causes an injury at a crossing is within the general scope of his employment, the company is responsible therefor notwithstanding the particular act or omission is unauthorized[8] and notwithstanding it is done wantonly or maliciously[9] However, unless the company expressly or impliedly assents thereto,[10] it is not responsible for unauthorized acts or omissions not within the general scope of a servant's employment;[11] and the mere fact that such servant was retained in its employment after the accident does not constitute a ratification of his act[12]

Negligence of one not its employee. A railroad company may be liable for damages resulting from the negligence of one not its employee where it has, without objection and with notice, actual or constructive, permitted such person to engage in practices dangerous to those in proximity to its track and to whom the railroad owes the duty to protect from injury,[13] without taking precautions against injury resulting from such acts.[14]

Unset derailing device

Where railroad conductor, after placing coalcar on downgrade siding for brewery, left unlocked a set derailing device maintained on siding although he knew that car would be moved by brewery workmen, and car after passing through unset derailing device collided with plaintiff's truck at a private crossing after brewery workmen lost control of car in moving it to complete unloading, railroad was under duty to have the device in operation, and was chargeable with knowledge that car would be moved by others than its own employees.—Cusatis v. Lehigh Valley R. Co., supra.

discussed in Negligence §§ 103–115, even though a railroad company is guilty of a wrongful act or omission, in order to hold it responsible for an injury sustained at a railroad crossing on that ground it must appear that such act or omission is the proximate cause of the injury,[15] but where the negligence of the railroad or its operatives is the proximate cause of the damage the railroad is liable therefor.[16] Whether or not the negligence of the railroad company is to be deemed the proximate cause of the injury is to be determined from a consideration of all the facts and circumstances[17] Certainly, in the absence of any wrongful act or omission on the part of a railroad company or its servants, such company is not responsible for an injury which is the result of accident alone,[18] of the act or omission of a third person,[19] or of any other cause for which it is not responsible.[20]

Anticipated, natural, and probable consequences. In accordance with general rules and subject to applicable qualifications and limitations, discussed in Negligence §§ 108, 109, in general the railroad company may not be charged with liability where the injury was not a natural and probable consequence of the act or omission complained of[21] and one which men of ordinary prudence ought reasonably to anticipate might probably occur as a result of the alleged wrong.[22] In order to charge the railroad company, however, it is sufficient, provided all other elements of liability are present, if the injury is the natural and probable consequence of the wrongful act or omission;[23] and it is not necessary that all details leading up to the injury,[24] or the particular injury,[25] should be foreseen.

Negligence per se; violation of statute or ordinance. Even though the act or omission of the railroad is negligence per se,[26] as where a statute or ordinance has been violated,[27] civil liability generally cannot be predicated thereon unless such breach is the proximate cause of the injury and damage or substantially contributes thereto However, it has also been held that defendant's failure to observe statutory precautions renders it liable even though such failure was not the proximate cause of the injury and even though the negligence of plaintiff was the direct and proximate cause.[28]

Where motorist drove away apparently unhurt after crossing collision but later experienced headache which was allayed by sedatives and subsequently while driving another automobile lost consciousness and collided with telephone post, but there was no proof of cause of unconsciousness, no causal connection existed between crossing collision and collision with telephone post so as to impose any liability on railroad company for second collision even if first collision was caused by railroad's negligence —St Louis Southwestern Ry Co of Texas v Barr Tex Civ App, 148 S W.2d 924, error dismissed, judgment correct.

Improper operation in general. While the railroad company is liable where the improper operation of a train by its trainmen is the proximate cause of the injury and the other elements of liability are present,[29] the rule is otherwise where the negligent operation is not the proximate cause.[30] Thus, even if the length of the train was so great as to constitute an extraordinary hazard or negligence it is immaterial if there was no causal connection between it and plaintiff's injuries when the vehicle he was riding in was struck by the train at a crossing.[31]

Unlawful laying of tracks The mere fact that the railroad company failed to obtain a franchise or the consent of certain public officers to lay its tracks across a public highway may not be regarded as the proximate cause of a collision at a crossing.[32]

b. Concurrent and Intervening Causes

Where contributory negligence is not involved, a railroad company may be liable where its wrongful act or omission concurs with another cause to constitute the proximate cause of the injury; but the company is not liable where there is an intervening efficient cause for which it is not responsible and which it could not reasonably anticipate.

In accordance with general rules and subject to applicable qualifications and limitations, discussed in Negligence § 110, where contributory negligence is not involved, the wrongful act or omission of the railroad company need not, in order to render it liable, be the sole cause of the injury.[33] Thus the company may be liable where such act or omission concurs with another cause or other causes than a fault chargeable to the person sustaining the injury to constitute the proximate cause of the injury,[34] as, for example, where its wrong concurs with a lawful act on its part,[35] or with an event or condition over which the railroad company has no control,[36] such as the act or omission of a third person,[37] and this is so where the concurring negligence is that of the driver of the vehicle which was damaged[38] or in which the injured person was riding.[39] In such case both tort-feasors will be jointly and severally liable.[40] So also several wrongful acts or omissions of the railroad company may concur to constitute the proximate cause.[41]

Intervening cause. In accordance with general rules and subject to applicable qualifications and limitations, discussed in Negligence § 111, where there is an intervening efficient cause for which the railroad company is not responsible, and the occurrence of which could not reasonably be anticipated, the company may not be held liable on the theory that its wrongful act or omission was the proximate cause.[42] Thus the railroad is not liable where the sole proximate cause of the injury is the act or omission of a third person,[43] as where it is the negligence of the driver of the motor vehicle in which the injured person was riding[44] However, the act or omission of the railroad company need not be the immediate cause of the injury, or the nearest in point of time or sequence of events,[45] and, if such act or omission is the last event contributing to the injury without which the injury would not have occurred, such act or omission is the proximate cause of the injury,[46] even though some other incidental cause ensues, without contributory negligence on the part of the person sustaining the injury, which may in some degree aid in inflicting the injury.[47] So, where an intervening cause is not such as breaks the sequence or chain of events following the railroad company's wrong,[48] as, for example, where the occurrence of the intervening cause might reasonably be anticipated,[49] or is set in motion by the

Failure to give signal; icy surface
Where railroad failed to give statutory signals but motorist would have been able to stop and avoid collision but for snow and ice, the railroad company's wrongful act or omission,[50] in general liability may not be avoided on the theory that the negligence was not the proximate cause.

§ 758. —— Defects or Obstructions at Crossings

A railroad company wrongfully causing or permitting a defect or obstruction at a crossing, such as an obstruction by trains or cars, is not liable for injury unless such defect or obstruction is the proximate cause of the injury.

A railroad company is not liable for an injury, because of its wrongfully causing or permitting a defect or an obstruction at a crossing, where such defect or obstruction is not the proximate cause of the injury;[51] and whether a defect or obstruction at a crossing is the proximate cause of the injury depends on the circumstances.[52] In this connection and under the circumstances of the particular case it has been held or recognized that certain defects due to a failure properly to construct or to maintain crossings or the approaches thereto,[53] including bridges over tracks or highways or the approaches thereto,[54] were not the proximate causes of the injuries complained of; and this has also been held true of certain obstructions,[55] including obstructions by trains or cars.[56]

snow and ice did not constitute a new intervening efficient proximate cause completely exculpating the railroad's negligence—Jackson v St Louis-San Francisco Ry. Co, 211 S. W.2d 931, 357 Mo 998

the defect or obstruction is the proximate cause of the injury complained of and all other elements of liability are present.[57] In this connection and under the facts of the particular case, it has been held or recognized that certain defects due to a failure properly to construct or to maintain crossings or the approaches thereto,[58] including highway bridges over tracks[59] and streets under tracks,[60] were the proximate causes of the injuries complained of; and this has also been held true of certain obstructions,[61] including wrongful obstructions by trains, cars, or locomotives.[62]

§ 759. —— Gates, Signals, or Flagmen at Crossings

A railroad company is not liable because of its act or omission in respect of gates, a flagman or watchman, or other signs, signals, or warnings, unless such act or omission is the proximate cause of the injury complained of.

A railroad company is not liable where its act or omission in respect of gates,[63] a flagman or watchman,[64] or other signs, signals, or warnings[65] at a crossing is not the proximate cause of the injury complained of, as, for example, where the act or omission in respect of such protective agencies does not contribute to the injury.[66] So, in order to charge the railroad company with liability for failure of a signal at a crossing to operate, the injury must have resulted from the particular danger for protection against which the signal was designed.[67]

On the other hand, a railroad company is liable where its wrongful act or omission in respect of gates,[68] a flagman or watchman,[69] or other signals or warnings[70] at a crossing is the proximate cause of the injury complained of and the other elements of liability are present Where a driver of a motor vehicle on approaching a crossing at which the company is required to keep a flagman sees no flagman and no flag in front of the first track on the crossing where he has a right to expect to see him in case a train is approaching, and sees no train, he is not guilty of negligence in proceeding, as discussed infra § 792, and where the flagman then appears and gives warning, but only in time to enable the chauffeur to stop on the first track where he is almost immediately struck by a train, the accident will be attributed to the negligence of the flagman.[71]

§ 760. —— Signals, Lights, or Lookouts on Trains or Cars

A railroad company is not liable because of its failure to keep a lookout, or to give the customary or statutory signals, or to maintain proper lights, unless such failure is the proximate cause of the injury complained of.

A railroad company is not liable if there is no legal causal connection between the failure to keep a lookout,[72] or to give the customary or statutory signals,[73] or to maintain proper limits,[74] on approaching a crossing, and the injury complained of, as, for example, where giving the signals would not have prevented the injury,[75] or where the traveler,[76] including a person traveling in a vehicle,[77] has complete knowledge in respect of the approach of the train. While there is authority for the view that, if the driver of the vehicle has notice of the approach of the train, the failure of the railroad company to give signals would not be the cause of an injury to one riding with such driver,[78] some courts refuse to extend the rule that the failure to give signals is not the proximate cause of an injury where the traveler has knowledge of the approach of the train to the case of an injury sustained by a person who had no knowledge of such approach, although the driver of the vehicle in which the injured person was driving had such knowledge.[79] Accordingly, such rule does not apply where the traveler, although he knows of the approach of the train, is deceived by a defective headlight on the locomotive as to the distance of such train from the crossing.[80]

In any event, a failure to give the customary or statutory signals,[81] or failure to maintain a proper lookout[82] or the required lights,[83] will make the railroad company liable for an injury sustained by an accident at the crossing, where it is shown that such failure is the proximate or contributing cause of the injury, and the other elements of liability are present.

§ 761. —— Rate of Speed and Control of Train

A railroad company is not liable because its train was operated at an unlawful or excessive speed, or because the train was not equipped with proper appliances for stopping or checking speed, unless such speed or lack of control was the proximate cause of the injury complained of.

A railroad company is not liable on the ground that the train was operated at an unlawful, or otherwise excessive, speed where such operation was not the proximate cause of the injury for which recovery is sought,[84] as, for example, where the injury was not the natural and probable result of the excessive speed,[85] or where the exces-

Opportunity to alight from stalled car

Fact that automobile was already stalled on grade crossing did not render failure to give proper warning immaterial, since, although absence of warning did not result in automobile being driven upon the tracks, a warning at the statutory distance would have afforded driver and occupant of automobile an opportunity to alight therefrom and escape injury.—Canadian Pac. sive speed did not contribute to the injury,[86] and this is also true of the failure to apply brakes immediately on discovering the danger.[87] Likewise, where a failure to equip a train with proper appliances for stopping or checking speed is not the proximate cause of the injury, liability of the railroad company cannot be based on its failure so to equip.[88] On the other hand, wrongfully running a train at a rate of speed in violation of a statute or ordinance, or at a rate otherwise excessive, imposes liability on the railroad company for resultant injuries where such speed is the proximate cause of the injury and the other elements of liability are present.[89]

§ 762. —— Fright or Unmanageableness of Animal

A railroad company ordinarily is not liable for injuries resulting from the fright or unmanageableness of an animal unless some wrongful act or omission on the part of the company is regarded as the proximate or concurring cause of such fright or unmanageableness.

A railroad company is not liable for injuries resulting from the fright or unmanageableness of an animal where such fright or unmanageableness is not the proximate result of any wrongful act or omission on its part and the company is not otherwise chargeable with any wrongful act or omission,[90] as, for example, where its negligence is only the remote cause of the fright or unmanageableness,[91] or where there is no causal connection between the negligence for which a recovery is sought and such fright or unmanageableness.[92]

Where the fright is caused by an operation or condition in respect of which the company is not guilty of any breach of duty, the fright is generally regarded as the proximate cause of the resultant injury,[93] and not such operation or condition.[94] Where, however, such fright or unmanageableness is the proximate result of a wrongful act or omission of the railroad company and the other elements of liability are present, the company is liable for injuries resulting from such fright or unmanageableness;[95] and such wrongful act or omission,[96] and not the fright or unmanageableness of the animal,[97] is in a legal sense the proximate cause of the injury.

Concurrent and independent causes. The railroad company may be liable where its wrongful act or omission causes the fright or unmanageableness of the animal and this concurs with a cause other than the negligence of the person sustaining the injury to produce the injury complained of,[98] as, for example, where such concurring cause is one over which the railroad company has no control.[99] So also, the liability of the railroad company may, according to some cases, be based on its wrongful act or omission which concurs with the fright or unmanageableness of the horse to produce the injury complained of, although no wrongful act or omission on its part caused such fright or unmanageableness[1] In some cases, however, the fright or unmanageableness of the animal, which was not caused by any act or omission of the railroad company, has been regarded as the proximate cause of the injury[2] or as an independent intervening agency,[3] and the railroad company is not liable notwithstanding its wrongful act or omission to some extent contributed to, or was involved in, the accident. In any event, if the railroad company is not chargeable with a breach of duty in respect of a condition at the crossing which to some extent contributes to the injury, such condition may not be regarded as the proximate cause[4]

Where motorist, turning away from railroad crossing, in confusion backed car into train, excessive speed of train was not proximate cause of motorist's injury.—Chumley v. Louisville & N. R. Co., 165 S.E. 917, 45 Ga. App. 732.

§ 31.1. National Railroad Passenger Corporation

Under the Rail Passenger Service Act of 1970, a basic system of intercity rail passenger service for the whole country is operated by a National Railroad Passenger Corporation (Amtrak), and railroads contracting with the corporation for its assumption of passenger service are relieved of responsibility for providing this service.

The Rail Passenger Service Act of 1970 [35.1] is a national attempt to preserve and revitalize intercity railway passenger service,[36.1] and it was enacted by Congress because of the worsening rail passenger crisis [37.1] Its validity has been upheld against various objections,[38.1] including objections that it violated the due process [39.1] and equal protection [40.1] clauses of the Constitution.

This legislation authorized the formation of a National Railroad Passenger Corporation, which has been called "Amtrak," [41.1] and it directed the Secretary of Transportation to designate a "basic system" of intercity rail passenger service for the whole country.[42.1] Except to the limited extent that it permits rail service beyond the basic system,[43.1] it envisages that passenger service over any lines not included in the basic system will be discontinued.[44.1] As to lines included within the system it permits any railroad to enter into a contract with Amtrak under which Amtrak will assume the burden of operating the service, thereby relieving the railroad of its entire responsibility for providing intercity passenger service.[45.1] The procedure for discontinuance of passenger trains or services is provided for by the Act.[46.1]

Under express provisions of the Rail Passenger Service Act, fair and equitable arrangements must be made by railroads signing contracts with the National Railroad Passenger Corporation (Amtrak) to protect the interests of employees affected by discontinuances of intercity rail passenger service.[47.1] The determination whether the labor protective provisions of the contract afford the affected employees fair and equitable protection is committed to the discretion of the Secretary of Labor, and is not subject to judicial review either under the Rail Passenger Service Act[48.1] or the Administrative Procedure Act.[49.1] Even assuming that the court has jurisdiction to review the determination of the Secretary, that review must be narrowly and carefully limited,[50.1] and concerns only the question whether the Secretary abused his discretion in certifying the protective arrangements as fair and equitable.[51.1]

In general terms, the purpose of the Rail Act is to provide a rail service system in the Midwest and Northeast regions of the United States which is adequate to meet the needs and service requirements of those regions and of the national rail transportation system,[39.28] and it is not intended to absolve trustees of a railroad in reorganization from financial responsibility.[39.29] The Interstate Commerce Act and the Bankruptcy Act provision relating to railroads undergoing reorganization may properly be resorted to to ascertain Congressional intent in using the term public interest in the Rail Act.[39.30]

In enacting the Rail Act, Congress expressed a preference for proceeding under such Act rather than a continuation of reorganization of railroads pursuant to the Bankruptcy Act,[39 31] and a court would be justified in precluding resort to procedures of the Rail Act only for the most compelling reasons.[39 32] Thus, if a court finds that the public interest would be equally well-served by a railroad undergoing reorganization pursuant to the Bankruptcy Act provisions or pursuant to the provisions of the Rail Act, the procedures of the latter Act must be chosen.[39 33] The Rail Act creates a presumption in favor of a reorganization thereunder, but such presumption is not conclusive.[39 34]

The first step in the scheme of the Rail Act is the so-called 120-day decision of whether a railroad is reorganizable on an income basis within a reasonable time under the Bankruptcy Act and that the public interest would be better served by such reorganization than by a reorganization under the Rail Act,[39 35] and a railroad that cannot be reorganized on an income basis within a reasonable time under the Bankruptcy Act is eligible for reorganization under the Rail Act.[39 36] If the court concludes that the railroad cannot be reorganized on an income basis within a reasonable time under the Bankruptcy Act, the next step is the 180-day decision under the Rail Act which requires that reorganization proceed pursuant to the Rail Act, unless the court finds that the Rail Act does not provide a process which would be fair and equitable to the estate of the railroad in reorganization.[39 37] In other words where a court concludes that a railroad in reorganization no longer has the ability to reorganize on an income basis pursuant to the Bankruptcy Act, it is required to order that reorganization proceed pursuant to the Rail Act, since such latter Act provides a process which is fair and equitable to the debtor's estate.[39 38] The Rail Act also makes provision with respect to a final system plan.[39 39]

The Rail Act precludes a court from attempting to terminate a reorganization proceedings on the ground that a "reasonable time" for reorganization has been exceeded, and also requires the court to assume that a reorganization which is completed in accordance with, and in the time span contemplated by, the Act will be "successful."[39 41] The court is also under an obligation not to permit the implementation of the Rail Act according to its terms to be frustrated.[39 42] However, within the preceding limitations, it is the continuing obligation of the court to attempt to insure that the best interests of the estate and the parties to the reorganization are not unnecessarily jeopardized, and to avoid intentional enlargement of eventual Tucker Act claims.[39 43]

The Rail Act supplements the procedures of the Bankruptcy Act by providing for the creation of a new operating company, called Conrail, which is to take over ownership and operation of those portions of the rail properties to be designated by the United States Railway Association (USRA), the planning agency created by the Rail Act.[39 44] The Rail Act[39 45] provides for financing during the period from the enactment of the Act to the conveyance to Conrail; in essence, it provides for grants to bankrupt railroads to m-

sure that such carriers are not forced to terminate rail operations for lack of cash.[39 46] Also, the Rail Act[39 47] provides funds to upgrade the rail properties which are to be conveyed to Conrail.[39 48]

The Rail Act provides for the establishment of a special court, with specified functions and powers.[39 49] While, the Rail Act gives to such special court all of the powers of a reorganization court, the special court's jurisdiction is limited to all judicial proceedings with respect to the final system plan.[39 50] In any event, the powers of a reorganization court may not be exercised without regard to the Rail Act.[39 51] The right of appeal depends on the provisions of the Rail Act,[39.52] and the appellate authority of the special court is limited to review of the orders entered with respect to the final system plan.[39.53]

Effect on Tucker Act. The legislative history of the Rail Act does not support the argument that the Act should be construed to withdraw the Tucker Act remedy of interest-holders in railroads subject to reorganization under the Rail Act,[39.54] and, in fact, the Tucker Act is available as a protection to railroads in reorganization coming under the Rail Act as a remedy to insure payment of a "fair and equitable consideration" for any "conveyance taking" or "erosion taking" thereunder.[39 55] Under a 1975 amendment to the Rail Act,[39 56] the fact that the trustees of a railroad in reorganization are given discretion to initiate proceedings to afford the court an opportunity to evaluate the ability of the railroad to continue its efforts to reorganize on an income basis does not render the Tucker Act remedy inapplicable.[39 57]

Federal railroad Safety Act of 1970. Congressional concern over the rapid increase in railroad accidents and the damage threatened by the release of explosive or volatile substances during such incidents has lead to the enactment of the Federal Railroad Safety Act of 1970.[6.5] The goals of the Act are remedial in nature and the courts must construe the statute liberally.[6 10]

The Act authorizes the Secretary of Transportation or his agents to enter upon, inspect and examine rail facilities, equipment, rolling stock, operations and pertinent records at a reasonable time and in a reasonable manner.[6 15] The Act countenances reasonable cooperation by the railroads to be inspected.[6 20] The railroad is required to bear responsibility for accidents arising from the negligence of railroad crew members in the course of an inspection authorized under the act.[6 25]
